NOTES.

A Nagging Note:—The body of the late Mr. Vithalbhai Patel was brought to Bombay on the S. S. Narkunda which arrived here on Thursday at 8 p. m. It was received at the pier by the relatives and friends of Mr. Patel and was conveyed to the G. T. Hospital where it was kept till Friday morning. On Friday the body was taken in solemn procession to the Hindu burning ground generally known as Sonapur and was there consigned to the flames. The proceedings in their subdued character were far more impressive than any spectacular demonstration. The decision of the Bombay Government withholding permission to cremate Mr. Vithalbhai's body on the foreshore at Chowpathy, has therefore not detracted from—rather has it enhanced—the value of the ceremony. It had many reasons to commend it. Chowpathy is the only bit of sandy beach adjoining the southern half of Bombay city. It is crowded during the greater part of the day with men, women and children. All along the shore there are residential and other buildings. Chowpathy is, for these reasons, the most unsuitable place one can think of for cremating a body on an open pyre. On hygienic and sanitary grounds also, cemeteries in India are as a rule placed at a distance from places of human habitation. These are very good reasons for not permitting corpses to be cremated on the foreshore. The Press Note, however, leaves these aside, and makes out that the main reason for refusing the request is the probability of similar requests being made, in future. If the present Government can refuse permission to the cremation of Mr. Patel's body on the foreshore notwithstanding the precedent created by Mr. Tilak's case, a future Government may be trusted to exercise its discretion with equal regard to the conditions that may then prevail. There is no good reason for assuming that it will be less mindful of its duty to the public than the present one. What is even more objectionable, is the dragging in of the Hindu community into this matter without any excuse whatever. The application was not made on the ground that Mr. Patel was a Hindu, and Hinduism has nothing to do with the question which the Government had to decide. According to Hindu ideas the cremation ceremony can only take place in the established smashans. The only exception is in the case of sanyasins who, however, are buried and not burned. The only conceivable result of introducing the Hindu name in this context, is to invoke communal jealousies. The person who drafted the Note might not have consciously intended it but that only shows how deep-rooted and insidious the communal appeal has become in certain types of minds. The Indian population is predominantly Hindu, whether one likes it or not, and there is no sense in nagging at it in the manner of this Note.

Affairs in Afghanistan:—A few days ago, Dr. Sir Muhammed Iqbal, Sir Syed Ross Masood and Syed Suleiman Nadvi, who had been invited by King Nadir Shah to advise him on educational reforms which he contemplated introducing in his country, returned to India. In their statement to the press they declared that there was complete safety of life and property in Afghanistan and that even the orthodox party stood solidly behind the King and his Ministers in their reforms. One of the leading divines was quoted by them as saying that in Afghanistan there was now no difference between the Mullahs and the young men. This statement was made on the 6th instant to the Associated Press. The news of the murder of King Nadir Shah on the 8th instant, therefore, came as a complete surprise to Indian readers. It is not known at the time of writing who the assassin was and what his motives were. It has not been suggested that he was a lunatic who could have had no particular motive to kill the King. The alternatives seem to be that the assassin was the tool of a clerical party opposed to Nadir Shah's reforms, or that he was instigated by the party in favour of the restoration of ex-King Amanullah, which seems to have been increasing in strength of late. The ex-King, who lives at Rome, in a statement to Reuter's representative said that if the Afghan people wished him to return with his programme of reforms and progress, he was always ready to serve his country with all his powers. He went on to denounce Nadir Shah's regime as a "reign of Affairs in Afghanistan:—A few days ago, Dr. Sir Muhammed Iqbal, Sir Syed Ross Masood and Syed Suleiman Nadvi, who had been invited by King Nadir Shah to advise him on educational reforms which he contemplated introducing in his country, returned to India. In their statement to the press they declared that there was complete safety of life and property in Afghanistan and that even the orthodox party stood solidly behind the King and his Ministers in their reforms. The ex-King, who lives at Rome, in a statement to Reuter's representative said that if the Afghan people wished him to return with his programme of reforms and progress, he was always ready to serve his country with all his powers. He went on to denounce Nadir Shah's regime as a "reign of terror in which intellectuals of all classes had been butchered." He added that he could not help feeling a little glad that Nadir Shah was gone, as he was a danger not only to his own people but to the neighbours of Afghanistan. Amanullah refused to reply to a further question whether he intended to return immediately to Afghanistan; but one of his retinue interposed and said that naturally as he was the head of Afghanistan for ten years, he cannot be ignored by his countrymen. We are afraid there are troublous times ahead for Afghanistan which, according to all accounts, was on the high road to a stable condition under King Nadir Shah.

An Expatriation Scheme:—The Hindu of Madras points out that the investigation now started in South Africa is quite different from the one which was acquiesced in by the South African Indian National Congress. "The task of exploring outlets for colonization," it observes, "was intended to be for the benefit in the main of the surplus population in India and incidentally of those Indians in South Africa who might desire to go out of South Africa, hoping to find better conditions in countries to which they emigrated. The preliminary investigation started by Mr. Hofmeyr, however, is for the purpose of investigating 'into the possibilities of a colonization scheme for settling South African Indians in other countries.'...It will, therefore, be seen that the declared object of the South African Government in starting this enquiry is to send as many Indians out of the Union as possible, an object with which the Indian community is in strong disagreement because they feel they have a right to stay in South Africa and be treated as permanent members of the population." We are not surprised to learn from a cable of the South African correspondent of the Hindu that the task of seeking out countries for colonisation by South African Indians, is not proving as easy as it was first believed it would be.

Co-operation Between Missions and Social Reformers:—In an outspoken article the Dnyanodaya, which is the mouthpiece of several Christian Missions in Western India, after paying a high tribute to the operations of the Servants of Untouchables Society, asks why there should not be co-operation between Missions and the Society. The answer is obvious. The Servants of Untouchables Society has amongst its articles one forbidding religious propaganda. Christian Missions are primarily proselytising agencies. The Lindsay Commission on Missionary Colleges in India, said "if we believe in co-operation, let us do it whole-heartedly and not pretend that we can both co-operate with non-Christians and yet talk about a distinctive Christian purpose." The Hocking Commission on the Appraisal of the Work of Missions, with deeper insight, saw that the distinctive Christian purpose was for missionaries to regard themselves as co-workers with the forces within other religious systems which are making for righteousness, and it discountenanced proselytism as a hindrance to such co-operation. The Dnyanodaya was one of the severest critics of the Hocking Commission. We are glad that it has now come to the same conclusion though it does not yet see that so long as Missions exist to proselytise, no co-operation is possible between them and non-Christian movements like the Servants of Untouchables Society. Incidentally, the Dnyanodaya calls attention to the hold of caste on Indian Christians. It estimates that more than one-half of the total Indian Christian population, is dominated by caste ideas; and it knows "some who know India far better than we do who put the figure even higher." We reprinted part of the Dnyanodaya's article in the Reformer of October 28.

The Nazis and India:—The first reactions of the British Press to political innovations have invariably been violent. This has coloured reports in Indian newspapers. Very often, however, there have been startling reversals of early impressions. The Nazi movement in Germany presents the latest instance of this. At the outset, the messages appearing in British newspapers and cabled by Reuter to the Indian press consistently represented Nazism as nothing greater than a system of Jew-baiting. That attitude has been abandoned, and it is now recognized that Hitler's programme is worth a more serious study. The Indian press fortunately has been in possession of materials other than those supplied through British channels and has utilised them for enabling the public to form its independent opinion of modern Germany and her reactions to new problems. This has been largely due to the statements issued from time to time by the German Consuls in India and to the communications of Indians who have recently returned from Germany. The messages of foreign correspondents to Indian papers have also contributed to establishing a better understanding of the German question. The recent controversy in Ceylon over Reuter's message from Berlin, relating to the revision of the marriage code in Germany, has resulted in an important statement from the German Consul for Ceylon and South India, explaining Germany's position in relation to the racial question. The contemplated legislation, as we believed, is solely concerned with an internal problem which has arisen in Germany after the war.

The Jews in Palestine:—Commenting on the position of Jews in Palestine, the Leader deplores British indifference to the feelings of the Arabs. It writes: "The Arabs may well inquire how they will be able to rule over Palestine when the country has passed into the hands of the Jews. There are a handful of Jews in South Africa, but it is they more than any other class of Europeans who are responsible for the humiliations injustice and oppression to which Asiatics are subjected under the Union Government."

BIRTH CONTROL.

The idea of improving the economic condition of the country by means of a vigorous propaganda in favour of birth control by contraceptive methods, has found unexpected support from some influential men. They have held public meetings and passed resolutions advocating measures to popularise the artificial limitation of families on a national scale. The enormous practical difficulties in the way of this measure, even the Spectator, which regards the increase of Asiatic populations as a menace to European civilisation, has felt obliged to recognise. It wrote in its issue of September 29: "It is hardly conceivable that birth control methods should be adopted in the East as things are. The simplest of such methods involves the use of appliances of one kind or another, and the cost of them would militate fatally against their adoption by the poorest classes, which are also the most fertile classes, of the population of Asiatic countries, even if there were no religious objection to be surmounted. It might well be an act of wisdom on the part of the governments in Asia to make the free issue of contraceptives by approved clinics possible, but there is no visible prospect of that, and so far clinics do not even exist, apart from half a dozen or so, in India." We can not imagine that these considerations are not present to the minds of the advocates of birth control in this country. We rather think that the impelling motive in their case is their knowledge of the hardships in individual cases. One of the most distressing sights, is that of bright young girls broken in health and reduced to skin and bone within half a dozen years of their marriage. The children themselves are underfed and start life with a strong tendency to hypochondria which often develops in after life to cynicism and inappreciation of the joy of life for themselves and intolerance of it in others. The advocates of birth control among us would seem to have been moved more by such instances than by a consideration of the practicability of their proposals. It is a delicate task to suggest to an over-uxorious son-in-law that he should include some consideration for the health of his wife among his matrimonial responsibilities. A public propaganda avoids this necessity. Unless the relative concerned is one of those individuals who never open a newspaper, there is a chance of his lighting on the speeches of eminent men in favour of birth control and of his adopting it in his own case. We do not say that all or most of the elderly advocates of birth control are actuated by this desire to compass a private end by public propaganda. But it is not unlikely to be present in the minds of some of them and, if it were, we should not think that it is a matter for reproach. So far as the propaganda in favour of birth control promotes among husbands at thought for the consequences of too frequent child-bearing on their wives, it is a movement to be welcomed.

This kind of experience is to be met with chiefly among the middle classes. For the working classes who are the vast majority, the argument holds, namely, that if every addition to the population is a mouth more to feed it is also a pair of hands more to work. Looking at the question from the national point of view, therefore, the problem of the increase of population is the problem of providing increasing work. The advocacy of birth control is detrimental to national progress in that it diverts attention from the real issue which Government and publicists have to face. Dr. Hutton may be excused for suggesting this as a short cut to national progress involving no change or very little in the political and economic systems under which he serves and we live. The Spectator is very simple when it suggests that the Japanese Government should distribute birth control appliances free among its subjects in order to avert the menace to Europe of the rapid growth of Japan's population. From the true nationalist standpoint, an increase of population should be a source of strength and not one of weakness. If the birthrate is appreciably lowered, the death rate remaining what it is, the Indian population will be very soon on its way to extinction. In passing, it is surprising that the modern invention of methods of rejuvenation, which is calculated to increase the population at the other end of the age scale, has escaped the censure of the Census Commissioner. The most valuable part of his contribution to the population problem is that which we quoted in our leading article on the 21st. October. The rise of the standard of life in the West has led to the progressive decrease in the birthrate. Dr. Hutton, rather incomprehensibly, understands the standard of life to mean access to adequate supplies of food and goes on to show that this by itself would not be enough. The standard of life does not consist in the amount of the feed. We do not speak of the standard of life of cows and horses although some animals are well-fed and others are on the verge of starvation. The standard of life concerns directly the higher emotional and intellectual nature of man more than the food he eats. Over-feeding is often a cause of sterility. Nature takes the problem into its own hands in such cases. The underlying reason for the large increase of low standards in human life, is that indicated in a pregnant observation by one of the characters of George Eliot. Men to whom the higher pleasures are denied needs must fall back on the lower animal ones. A low standard of life is the denial of the higher intellectual and aesthetic instincts. The sexual act is the sole diversion in which the illiterate masses can indulge. Birth control propaganda is likely to do harm by obscuring this important need of national policy.

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA—IX.

MODERN TRENDS IN WORLD RELIGIONS.

The Haskell lectures were to begin on the 31st July. Before that I was asked to speak at the Institute, also a part of the same foundation, on "Modern Trends in World Religions." There were four heads into which the subject was divided. The first was "World Religions and Modern Scientific Thinking." There were six speakers, one on each religion: Islam, Judaism, Christianity, Buddhism, Confucianism and Hinduism. Professor Edward Ames read a short paper on the position of Christianity, which was published in the Reformer of the 2nd September. The first and last sentences of his admirable paper, gave me the clue to what I should say, speaking for Hinduism. What is modern scientific thinking? Professor Ames defined it in his opening sentence. "Scientific thinking," he said, "is a definite, conscious, method of examining facts in a given field in the most objective and impartial manner possible, interpreting them in the light of the hypotheses which these facts themselves suggest, and seeking further relevant facts and more adequate hypotheses." This is the experimental method as distinguished from the dogmatic methods associated in the West with religion.* In my twenty minutes' speech, I pointed out that the antithesis between the two methods did not exist in Hinduism which held that religious truths were quite as demonstrable as scientific truths. When some one asked Ramakrishna Paramahansa whether he had seen God, he replied that not only had he seen God but he could show Him to the questioner. The Gita declares that the religion it is proclaiming is demonstrable—pratyakshagamyam. Professor Ames concluded: "Just as different languages and literatures may be translated into one another, so the great faiths when scientifically understood not only become intelligible to one another but become co-operative forces in the spiritual life of mankind." This was the conclusion of Science. It was, I said, the starting-point of Hinduism. All religions, to the Hindu, were so many different aspects of Truth and all were entitled to reverence, though, to most men, the particular religion in which they were born and brought up, offered the easiest way of spiritual development.

The subject for the second day was: "World Religions and Modern Social Economic Problems." I was the first speaker. I interpreted "Social", to refer to problems concerning the relation of men and women and consequent changes in the attitude to marriage and family life. Hindu reformers, I said, have for a hundred years been engaged in promoting reforms in these spheres in response to modern influence but not in imitation of the West. In all problems, except the political where the West is unreservedly accepted as the pioneer Indian reformers sought and generally obtained light from ancient sources. Nearly all social reforms advocated by them had been accepted by the people and the old bitter opposition had disappeared. But Indian reformers were handicapped by the absence of legislative and administrative powers without which they could not make their reforms effective in the life of the community. This was one of the strongest reasons underlying the demand for self-government.

In the Economic sphere none of the Indian religious cultures had a chance of producing their own reactions to modern influences, as the economic policy of the country was imposed on it from without. At the same time, it has been all along evident that if they had had the opportunity, the Indian cultures, and the Hindu particularly, would not have evolved Free Trade, for instance, as the most suitable fiscal policy for this country. Notwithstanding the protests of Indian opinion, Free Trade, which has now been unceremoniously discarded in its birthplace, was forced upon India. The present political movement in India was distinguished from its predecessors by the large amount of support it derived from the commercial classes. Just as in the case of social progress, in economic matters also the want of self-governing powers was felt to be a great handicap. As a striking illustration of the industrial policy followed, I instanced our railways. There were some forty thousand miles of them but we were still importing locomotive engines. India for a hundred years, I summed up, has been developed for consuming and not for producing purposes. She has been treated as a market and not as a nation with an ancient culture.

The other subject I had to speak on was "The Task of Modern Religion." Religion has succeeded in humanising individual conduct but it has so far not seriously attempted to humanise the conduct of nations towards each other. Its task now I said, was to get mankind to extend the ethical principles which governed the conduct of individuals in civilised communities to dealings also of nations with one another.

The proceedings of the Institute were taken down on a typewriter in shorthand. I noticed a gentleman sitting in the front playing leisurely on a typewriter before him and took him to be a student who was taking notes of the lectures. On the second or third day I happened to meet him and referred to his taking notes on his typewriter. He told me that the machine which he was using was fitted with shorthand types and he was taking down the proceedings verbatim. I do not remember to have seen a machine of this kind in India. The machine was practically silent and did not disturb the speakers in the least.

In the Institute all the religions except Islam were represented by persons to whom they were wholly or largely their spiritual heritage. Judaism was ably represented by Professor Mordecai Kaplan, Professor Abraham Cronbach and Rabbi Solomon Goldman. We, in India, have no idea of the great developments in Hebrew religious thought in these days. We have ancient Jewish communities in India but they are wedded to the old ideas and ritual and are not taking part in the great contributions which Jewish thinkers in other lands are making to religious ideology. The Jews who came later to India are immersed in finance and the race course, and do not count in the intellectual field. What is of especial interest to Hindu thinkers is that the modern developments in Hebrew religious thought are closely parallel to the movements in Indian religious thought. Between liberal Judaism and liberal Hinduism there is a very close resemblance amounting almost to affinity. This was the impression which I formed from listening to the addresses of the Jewish speakers, particularly to that of the Rabbi, Goldman, at the Institute.

The Christian point of view was most ably presented by masters like Professor Ames, Professor Hocking, Bishop McConnell and Professor Taylor of Vanderbilt University. They are all in the front ranks of religious and philosophic thought and the sentences which I have quoted from Professor Ames' paper, are fairly representative of the trend of progressive American thought in religion. Here, again, I felt gladdened by the approximation of modern religious thought to the religio-philosophic movement among us, so abundantly evident in their contributions. Co-operation and not competition among religions, was the keynote of them all.

The point of view of Buddhism was presented most sympathetically by Professor James Bissett Pratt, a lifelong student of Eastern religions, especially Buddhism. Professor Hideo Kishimoto of Harvard University also spoke from the Buddhist point of view on "The Task of Modern Religion." Both speakers seemed to be agreed that Buddhism in China and Japan was not reacting vigorously to modern influences as shown by the tendency in these lands to take over Western ideas and institutions without any attempt at adaptation.

Dr. Hu Shih was the principal representative of Confucianism. He had evidently little faith in religion as a means of national regeneration and his exposition of Confucianism was rather an exposure of its utter failure in China. Dr. Hu Shih has been called the father of Chinese Nationalism. He is a very brilliant product of American universities and bears no resemblance whatever to the traditional Chinese scholar. Compared to Dr. Hu Shih, Professor Lewis Hodous who also spoke for Confucianism took a more hopeful view of its possibilities as a factor of Chinese progress.

The speakers on Islam, Professor Martin Sprengler and Professor Henry Allen were both very sympathetic but they drew their conclusions mainly from Turkey and Egypt and almost totally ignored the important contributions which Indian Islam has made to religious thought. Owing chiefly to their preoccupation with politics, the leaders of Islam in India are letting valuable opportunities pass by for taking their place in the momentous movement of thought in our time.

The task of presenting the Hindu point of view was ably shared by Professor S. L. Joshi who, though a professing Christian, very enthusiastically defended Hindu culture and philosophy against the attacks made on it by missionaries and others. I met several Indian Christian young men in America and it was pleasing to find that almost every one of them shared Professor Joshi's views in regard to their ancestral faith. This is partly due to the national movement in this country. It is also to some extent due to the fact that everyone who goes from India is known as a Hindu and grows to think of himself as a Hindu. The communal spirit which is so painfully evident in India is totally absent among Indians in America. The only Indian Muslim student whom I met there was as staunch a nationalist as any of his fellows of other creeds.

The occasion for my meeting this young Indian Muslim was itself significant. He was actively promoting a scheme for a scholarship to enable an Indian woman student to be sent to Chicago. The University authorities, he told me, were likely to give her a free scholarship and he was trying to raise the money needed for her expenses. For this purpose, he and other Indian students with the help of America friends were getting up a performance of the Mrichakatika or "Toy Cart" an ancient Indian play in English. We attended the performance and were struck by the enthusiasm shown by the several characters, mostly Americans, in their respective parts. The exhibition of Indian dancing by an American girl who took part in the performance, evoked general applause. I was asked to say a few words at the end. I expressed my surprise and admiration at the understanding with which the several parts were presented and, particularly, of the excellent exhibition of Indian dancing. I understood later that the performance had resulted in a substantial contribution to the scholarship scheme. K. N.

A "SYNTHETIC" CHRIST.

The Editor,
Indian Social Reformer.
Sir,

It is reported that once when Mahatma Gandhi was asked what would be the best way to further Christianity in India, he said, "You must practise your religion without adulterating it or toning it down."

Among the intelligentsia in India there is growing apace a desire for an international religion. They are turning to Jesus Christ as a centre around whom they can all rally, but their writings upon this subject display a great lack of comprehension.

Jesus Christ is God Almighty Incarnate.

God, in Jesus Christ, Himself hung and suffered upon the Cross.

In the Mystery of the Redemption God—Jesus Christ—the Cross—are inseparable entities.

Jesus Christ can have no rival; but He is the fulfilment of the Spiritual aspirations of all time and of all the world.

Christianity has its articles of faith, which are not those of Hinduism. Truly, in the high altitudes of Mysticism adherents of all creeds can meet on a common ground. But Mysticism is not a working Faith. Such must have some dogma and fundamentals; and in the foundations of Christianity and Hinduism will be found little mutual reciprocity.

A "synthetic" Christ may be adapted who will usefully serve as a figurehead for a new "composite" religion, but its inaugurators must be under no illusion that this will be either the Jesus Christ of the Gospels, or of history, or of the Christian Faith.

ECCLESIASTICAL LIQUOR PROPAGANDA *

Intemperate language is very often the sign of a troubled conscience, and someone writing in The Bombay Diocesan Magazine for November over the signature of 'Chaplain' employs such intemperate language that we do not propose to follow his example. He is deeply disturbed that a weighty publication in Geneva should attach importance to our Liquor Memorandum of June 15 and 22 and that some part of the Christian Church and Missions in India should be agitating against the existence of the drink traffic in India as stated in our issue of October 5. Our friend is clearly a diligent reader of the Dnyanodaya for he also draws his ammunition from our issue of May 11 when we commented on a liquor advertisement in our Diocesan contemporary. The purpose of our columns is neither polemical nor the free advertisement of what we regard as a most irreverent view concerning our Lord and the connection between temptation and sacramental observance. We therefore refrain from quoting the intemperate terms he uses regarding 'the intemperate temperance advocated by the Dnyanodaya' except to say that we believe a fuller knowledge of Jewish customs in the time of our Lord would have restrained him from using the word 'sacrilege' in the connection in which he uses it. We are ashamed to say that The Bombay Diocesan Magazine, published with the sanction of the Lord Bishop, is still advertising 'all qualities of Wines, Whiskies, Rums, Beers' and that the very same advertisement is still appearing every week also in the Roman Catholic weekly Examiner, both of which ecclesiastical journals are soliciting 'trial orders' for these intoxicating liquors. And yet some people wonder why the message of Jesus Christ is so slow in its progress among the educated people of Western India, though these latter have said repeatedly that they cannot understand how the disciples of Jesus can help on liquor propaganda in any shape or form. Hundreds of millions of people pray daily, as instructed by Jesus, 'Lead us not into temptation' but such advertisements in Romanist and Anglican journals lead their readers straight into temptation. We can assure our contemporaries it affords us no pleasure to write like this, and we feel certain that if they knew how they are hindering the kingdom of Christ with many of India's worthiest people they would cleanse their otherwise useful pages of these offences'.

THE INDIAN CHRISTIAN MARRIAGE ACT.

(SECTION 68 AGAIN.)

The religious persecution of Panchamas under this formidable penal provision of the Christian marriage law by no means ended with the Ellore Sessions case which was reported and commented upon in the Reformer of 29th November and 6th December 1930 and 10th to 31st January 1931.

Close on its heels, in February 1931, came the Sessions case at Coimbatore resulting in the conviction of the Arumaigar, an elderly Pariah priest of 75 winters, who officiated at the Hindu wedding of a Christian at his request.

In May last an enterprising Roman Catholic functionary of Trichinopoly got the Police to club this Marriage Act Section with the notorious "preventive" Section 144 of the Criminal Procedure Code to expel by force from the local Public Hall a wedding party arranged by the leaders of the "Self-Respect" movement, who once belonged to the Minkulam Christian community but had long left the Church as a protest against the tyranny of the clergy.

And now comes the news of another Sessions case decided in Guntur recently on 20th October 1933 under the same Section of the Christian Marriage Act coupled with the "abetment" section 114 of the Indian Penal Code.

The gist of the offence under Section 68 of Act XV of 1872 is the solemnizing of the marriage of a Christian by one not authorised under section 5 of the Act to do it. The maximum punishment provided for the offence is transportation or rigorous imprisonment for 10 years besides fine. The occurrence which usually calls forth this Section into action in the Madras Presidency is the performance of a marriage with Hindu ritual between a Christian and a Hindu, which is not uncommon among the Depressed Classes of this Province.

A valid custom of this kind has been recognised to exist among these classes even by the Madras High Court on the Civil side of its jurisdiction and the Hindu marriage ritual ordinarily used was held to effectuate a valid conversion to Hinduism as well as a valid Hindu marriage simultaneously (1910 I. L. R. 33 Madras 342). But on its Criminal side the same High Court has held by a Full Bench in 1916 that the performance of it is an offence under the Christian Marriage Act. This is the governing law of our criminal courts in Madras to-day, though the High Courts in North India call the Madras ruling an error. (I. L. R. 40 Madras 1030 and 40 Allahabad 393.)

The complainant is usually a Christian clergyman. Whether European or Indian, he has only to write a letter of complaint to the District Magistrate or D. S. P., or Police Sub-Inspector to be sure of getting whole families of innocent "offenders" arrested and charged before a Sub-Magistrate, who in turn is sure to commit them for trial to the Sessions Court whatever may be the Defence plea. In the present case the complainant was an Indian gentleman connected with the American Lutheran Evangelical Mission. He was not only a Christian Marriage Registrar but also Supervisor of Christian congregations in Repalli Taluk (Guntur District).

Along with the Hindu priest who is supposed, by a legal fiction arising from a lawless necessity, to be the principal offender, for other persons dubbed as his "abettors" were hauled up as the accused, namely, the Hindu bridegroom, his father, his paternal uncle and the alleged 'Christian' bride's father,—all of the Madd community of Depressed Classes.

One fact however must be noted at once with lively gratitude. It is that neither the Christian bride, nor her mother, nor her Hindu mother-in-law nor any other woman was dragged in the net and thrown into the dock. It may be owing to the Christian charity of the complainant or the Hindu stupidity of the Police who worked up the Prosecution. But the fact itself is in pleasing relief, when we recall that in the Ellore case of 1930 in which the complainant was the high-minded European manager of the United Lutheran Church Mission of Rajamundry, the accused, of whom there were six included among them not only the 'Christian' bride of barely 14 years but also the Hindu bridegroom's step-mother. The bride's mother and the bridegroom's own mother were happily dead by that time.

The charge sheet laid at the instance of the Wesleyan Indian Clergyman in the Coimbatore Sessions case of 1931 discloses an even more severe self-restraint. It was directed against the Hindu priest alone. This wise generosity had its own tactical advantages. The Christian bridegroom who had strayed from his duty to the church could be won back to its side by being chosed as Prosecution witness along with his bride instead of being made a co-accused with the luckless man whose priestly services they had themselves voluntarily requisitioned. The courts took it for granted that the Christian remains still a Christian in intention as well as in law when he went through the Hindu marriage ritual of his own accord, and therefore gave him no trouble to explain how it came about. The unfriended old priest left in Jail on remand for over 6 weeks had no option but to "repent". He pleaded guilty and threw himself upon the mercy of the Sessions Judge who then compassionately let him off with a light sentence of imprisonment till the rising of the court and a small fine of ten rupees in view of his extreme old age and absence of any personal motive or deception on his part.

In the Ellore and Guntur cases however the accused were all acquitted in the Sessions court unanimously by the Assessors and the Judge. The ground for acquittal was that the bride who was alleged to have been a Christian was not a Christian, at all events, at the time when the Hindu marriage ritual was administered to her. It was admitted by the prosecution witnesses in the Ellore case that the father of the bride had on his own behalf and on behalf of his minor daughter openly declared to the church authorities more than a month before the marriage that they would come to the church no more and that he was bent on having a Hindu marriage for her. The learned sessions Judge held thereupon that that was sufficient to establish their renunciation of the Christian faith from the moment the declaration was made, since there was no particular formality prescribed by the law as condition precedent to a Christian abandoning the faith. In the Guntur case there were two circumstances in favour of the accused. The Christian father had admittedly presented a written petition to the church authorities no less than three months prior to the marriage in question asking them to remove the name of his minor daughter from the roll of Christians as she was being brought up as a Hindu by her Hindu grandmother. But the church authorities persisted in retaining her name in the church register. She had also a conversion ceremony performed to her with Arya Samaj rites one day prior to the marriage. These two facts were held by the Court to prove beyond question that the bride was not a professing Christian at the time of her Hindu marriage.

To the man-in-the-street who is elated by the passing triumphs of the moment without looking deep into the tragedy of the preceding trials, it may seem that these happy acquittals are proof that the penal law of the Christian marriage Act is innocuous in practice and no anxiety need be felt about the safety and freedom of the ignorant Panchama people, Hindu and Christian, living under its shadow.

But with a little sympathetic insight it is easy to grasp that the prospect of possible acquittal in the Sessions Court cannot be a comfort to these poor men and women whom it is so easy for an offended Christian official to drag through a harassing course of arrest, Police charge, magisterial inquiry, Committal and Sessions trial involving untold hardships to whole families for several months together, for no other fault than that they wish to marry the person they like with whatever ritual may appeal to their hearts. It is the clear duty of every friend of the voiceless Depressed Classes to investigate into the legal, moral and spiritual justification for such tyranny by one community over another in the name of religion. The obvious illegality of the Madras High Court interpretation of Section 68 was exposed long ago by the Allahabad High Court and is not respected in North India. It is for the oppressors to enlighten us on the moral and spiritual justifications of their cruel action. We have reason to know that they themselves feel they have no justification from the true Christian standpoint to use any other weapon than Christian church discipline in such cases. But they are tempted by the terrible engine which the Full Bench of 40 Madras has absent-mindedly placed in their hands to drive a steam-roller over heathen slums for the offence of exercising their free will in their own domestic concerns without heeding Pastoral admonitions.

No one in India wishes to be unfair to Christian missionaries or belittling the good that Christian missions have done to Panchamas under their spiritual care. But we believe that fact gives no moral or legal right to them to harm those who may not be yielding and submissive in every detail of life. At any rate it is the bounden duty of every Indian of whatever creed to wake up betimes and satisfy himself by diligent inquiry whether those who delight to apply the fire of Section 68 to poor Indian homes are taking care to see that the missionary standpoint coincides exactly with the true Christian standpoint, which we believe is also the humanitarian standpoint.

We know there are numerous Christian Missionaries and Clergymen, justly proud of their noble calling, who love to glorify their Master and his Church by purely spiritual means and who disdain to employ any but spiritual weapons to secure and retain the allegiance of his flock. We respectfully invite them to speak out their minds on the worthiness or otherwise of the use being made of the penal Section 68 as a Christian instrument for the guidance of their village workers. This is absolutely necessary in fairness to themselves and in the interest of inter-communal amity.

Here is a call also to men of good will everywhere who wish well of the "untouchables" with no partisan motive of exalting Hinduism or Christianity to the discredit of the other but with a pure desire to protect their freedom in the exercise of their rights. They have to do much organised propaganda among them and give legal help. At present the only legal advice the ignorant get in their villages is from the Christian pastor and his agents whose sole purpose is to dissuade them from having their own way with the marriage ritual, when it implies defection from the Church, by threats of prosecution and punishment in Criminal Courts. They are not told how they can have their own chosen ritual and yet be safe from legal molestation. It is for their well-wishers to make them understand that it is good for themselves to get such mixed marriages registered first as Civil marriages under the Christian Marriage Act (XV of 1872), which does not interfere with the religious faith of either party, before proceeding with whatever religious ceremony they may choose. Such registration not only disarms the Christian fanatic panting for religious reprisal under Section 68 but secures for the bride a better status as wedded wife among the Depressed Classes than mere Hindu ceremonial can do. If the Christian party to the marriage is willing definitely to declare himself or herself as professing the Hindu religion, whether understood in its narrow aspect or its broadest sense, nothing could be better for the parties to do than to register the marriage under Dr. Gour's amendment to the Special Marriage Act (III of 1872). This gives even a better status to the bride by securing for her rights of monogamy, and rights of inheritance under the Succession Act, more unassailable than under Act XV of 1872, by reason of certain provisions which are lacking in the latter. One may go further and say that it would be altogether to the good if the friends of the untouchables could persuade them to adopt as a general custom the practice of registering all their ordinary marriages as well under Dr. Gour's Act before or along with their religious ceremony. It will at once give a uniformity and respectability to the wedded life of these heterogeneous classes which it lacks at present and will free it from the evils of "promiscuity" and "easy divorce" spoken of by some Christian workers as existing among them.

Whether, however, we succeed in bringing about this large reform or not, we can at least befriended these classes by impressing upon them that it is absolutely necessary, in all mixed marriages between a Christian and a Hindu where Hindu ritual alone is contemplated, to place it beyond the ingenuity of the pastor and the police to pretend that the Christian party was legally still a Christian at the time of the marriage. The Ellore and Guntur cases have shown that neither the oral and written declarations of renunciation made to the church officials, nor even a conversion ceremony performed distinctly prior to the marriage, could avail to check the persecuting power of Section 68 up to the Sessions Court. Evidently some more efficacious method of publicity must be adopted, such as a declaration made before a magistrate and attested by him and publication in the papers or the Gazette before the performance of the marriage. The poor, illiterate, ignorant, timid and uninfluential people who are the usual victims of the penal section need all the vigilant attention and selfless care which educated friends can give them to ensure complete immunity by correct procedure.

But after all is said and done, however, it is painfully certain that it is an almost impossible task to reach every distressed family with timely advice and help. Unless the law itself is made perfectly safe for them, no help that propagandists can give will really avail. It is hopeless to expect that the Madras High Court will go out of its way to rectify the error of its Full Bench ruling of 1916. There is no reason why the fair interpretation put in North India on the scope of Section 68 as limited only to "marriages purporting to be Christian marriages" should not prevail even in the Madras Presidency under an Act which applies to all India. All that is required is to make that section fool-proof by inserting those express terms in the section so as to make it unmistakably clear that marriages solemnised by non-Christian priests with their own ritual cannot be brought under its mischief. Immediate legislation is therefore the best remedy for the present evil in this Province. We earnestly appeal to all friends and "servants" of the Depressed Classes to put their heads together, hold an inquiry to acquaint themselves with the actual facts of the situation and take quickly the necessary steps to an amending legislation. THE BRAHMO-SAMAJ.*

(BY DR. T. C. KHANDWALA.)

The ancestors of the Hindus were the Aryans who emigrated into India from Central Asia. The Aryan scriptures were the Vedas, which consisted of three parts, each representing a stage in their development. Of these, the third or latest was the most important. It was called the Upanishads. The Upanishads represent the height of the spiritual thought of the Aryans. The thinkers or seers of the Upanishads went through a process of evolution in their conception of the Ultimate Reality or Brahmo by which it rose step by step, stage by stage, from matter to Life, from Life to Mind, from Mind to Reason, from Reason to Love. Love is the highest Reality. It is the sustaining power of everything. In modern phraseology this idea can be paraphrased as "God is Love."

Brahma is the One Reality, who is in fire and water, and who dwells in the whole universe. He is One Power, who moves the sun, the moon and the stars. He is the one All-pervading Reality that dwells in the soul of all. He is the Indwelling Presence. He is the ear of the ear, the mind of the mind, the speech of the speech, the eye of the eye, the life of life, the soul of our soul. He is beyond the reach of the senses and the mind, and is incomprehensible in His fulness through the majesty of His infinitude, yet He is knowable in a way, not by any merely intellectual process, but by the discipline of the senses, purity of life and earnest meditation. The Upanishads emphatically assert: "One whose inmost self has been purified, he sees the Holy One in meditation. Yet whomsoever He elects, by him He is attainable." The attainment of God is the free gift of God. Here is the genesis of the doctrine of Grace or Divine Mercy. God-vision is not the end, but a means to an end. The final goal is Immortality. Immortality is rising above sorrow, suffering and sin, and dwelling in eternal peace and happiness in the company of God, who is Bliss and Love.

Pari passu with this conception of divinity, the conception of humanity in the Upanishads was equally high. The human soul is a spirit. This spirit the sword cannot pierce, nor fire burn, nor water drown. In its very essence it is free, holy, pure and perfect. It is eternal and immortal. It is a mirror of divinity. It is the image of God. It is the embodiment of the nature of God. It has kinship with God. It is a scattered ray of the Divine Light and Love. It has the germ of divinity within itself. With a bold outreach of thought, the Upanishads declare the human soul to have identity with the World Spirit, as expressed in the celebrated passage "Thou art That", that is to say "The human soul is one with the Supreme Soul".

As such the human soul has the potential capacity for infinite expansion and evolution, into the fulness of its divine attributes and perfection of itself. The goal of humanity is to attain this perfection. It is the mission of man's life to endeavour to reach this goal. He must struggle to reach an ever higher stage of life, of purity, of love, triumphing over the baser elements that drag life downwards and conquering selfish passions.

The Bhagavad-Gita is the compendium of the Upanishads. Its teaching is that man should live his life after the manner of the lotus. The lotus-plant grows in ponds. Its roots spread widely in the mud and slime at the bottom of the pool, but its leaves and its beautiful flowers keep above the water undefiled. So man must live his life in the midst of the impurities of the world but without being stained by them, keeping his heart always turned towards God. He must live a life of purity in the midst of the impurities and evils about him.

This conception of God and man had its reflex in social life. The seers of India laid down three social principles:

(1) This created world is one family. Humanity is a brotherhood, of which God is the Universal Father and Mother; therefore

(2) It is the privilege and the duty of man to see himself reflected in his brother-man and to see his brother-man reflected in himself, to recognize the complete identity or kinship of the soul of his brother-man with his own and his co-partnership with him in the gift of the divine nature; therefore

(3) Man should look upon his fellow-man with the eye of love and friendship.

Such are the teachings of the Upanishads. These, in summary, constitute the Vedanta. The Vedanta in turn was the basis of the Brahmo-Samaj.

The Vedanta emphasizes the worship of God through communion with him. This communion with God is called Yoga. The path to it is threefold. The first way is knowledge, i. e. a spiritual knowledge that comes to souls through purity, meditation, intuition and revelation. The second way is through action, i. e. deeds pleasing to God. The third way is love. The path of Knowledge is halting without being joined with the paths of Action and Love, and the paths of Action and Love are blind without being joined with the path of Knowledge. The most commendable course is to combine the three, and this the Brahmo-Samaj has done.

Brahmo-Samaj has accepted the basic truths or the eternal verities, embodied in the Hindu Scriptures. These eternal verities of the Hindu Scriptures have found expression also in the historic religions of the world. Not that one has borrowed them from the other; they are independent out-pourings of inspired souls. Every religion expounds, interprets and amplifies these eternal verities, and seeks their applications in life, in its own way according to the stage of the human development, and associated environments of the period of its promulgation.

Hinduism is an evolutionary faith, so is its daughter Brahmoism. Through the inspiration of its leaders, especially Maharshi Devendranatha Tagore, and Brahmanand Keshab C. Sen it has assimilated whatever it found to be good in the systems of faith and philosophy, encircling it. It has accepted the discipleship of the seers of the Vedas, and Upanishads, of Lord Shririshna of the Bhagavad-Gita, of Lord Buddha, of love and pity for the animate creation, and of inward purity, of Lord Jesus, the Apostle of Love of God, and man, of Shri Chaitanya, Kabir, Tukaram and other medieval saints of India, all spiritual gurus or masters of the world.

* An address delivered at the Fellowship of Faiths, Chicago.

The achievements of the Brahmo-Samaj during its life of a little more than one hundred years are in all fields of life, religious, moral, social, and political. Its sphere of influence was first felt among the Hindus.

The Hindus worshipped idols, but it should never for a moment be thought that they believed that sticks and stones were divinities in themselves. They used them for the concentration of their mind on the unseen power behind them. This unseen power they worshipped. The contact of the Brahmo lives, and the influence of the Brahmo teachings has emphasised this attitude of the Hindu mind. And although idol worship is not eradicated, behind all rituals, and behind all worship of images, there is the attitude of the belief in One Universal, All-pervading Spirit. The spirit of Brahmoism has so far penetrated the masses, and worked as a leaven that, although Brahmoism has not been accepted as the creed of the masses, and is even opposed, its hymns are sung in orthodox homes.....and even in orthodox temples, and it has created a spiritual atmosphere round the lives of the masses. And no wonder that it has done so, for Brahma Dharma has its roots in the spiritual soil of the Upanishads and the Gita of the hoary Hindu religion.

This spiritual atmosphere has erected a highly elevating moral atmosphere. The corrupt ideas of a century ago, have undergone a transformation and the good, the true, and the beautiful are having their proper values in life.

All this has had the effect of purifying home and social life and institutions. A century ago Hindu Society was beset with many social evils, such as child-marriage, polygamy, Purda system, prohibition of widow-remarriage, Suttee, the rigid caste system, prejudice against literacy of the female sex etc. The Brahmo-Samaj took the lead in the campaign against all these. It pleaded for education, and the introduction of the English language in the public schools and through it, English literature, and the Western sciences. It laid special emphasis on female education, and for the emancipation of woman, and her uplift in the social scale, giving her an equality with men in all the fields of life. The endeavours of the Brahmo-Samaj had their repercussions on Hindu Society and at present, Hindu Society is on its way to its old status of the freedom from these social evils.

The ideals of the Brahmo-Samaj have remodelled not only the spiritual and moral life of the Hindus but they have had their repercussions on the liberal thought of the sister communities of India and also the religious spirit of the West which has found in them a fresh way of the interpretations of its old tenets and there is now a firm ground of hope that the streams of the spiritual thought of the West and the East, now running parallel, would converge and meet and fertilise a new world, a heaven on earth.

Through a realisation of such a Catholic conception of God and men, and human relationships will come the real renunciation of hatreds and jealousies, conflicts of interest and wars and in their place, a lofty spirit of fellowship and co-operation will come to lift up the world out of the slough of depression, into which it has fallen, and glorify the words of Lord Buddha, viz "Love conquers hate", the rule of life of Mahatma Gandhi. May this day soon come.

A LIQUOR SHOP IN THE MILL AREA.

(By N. N. MENON)

A notice has been put up in Ruston Building on the Ferguson Road, Lower Parel, to the effect that a new retail Foreign Liquor Shop will shortly be opened in that building. The Ferguson Road area is entirely inhabited by the workers. There are about seven mills on this road besides the B. B. & C. I. Railway Work Shops in the close vicinity. There are already four country liquor shops, two toddy shops and two Bars, Foreign Liquor shops, on this road besides innumerable others within easy reach from this place. In short for every furlong there is a liquor shop and still the Government have sanctioned the opening of one more shop on the Road. Even the existing shops present enough temptation to the residents of the locality mostly workers in the Mills and the Railway Workshops. Consequently, the workers are driven deeper and deeper into poverty and misery and the locality presents a dismal scene of constant quarrels, murders and accidents. Being under the influence of liquor always due to the tempting facilities afforded, there is naturally dereliction of duty on the part of the workers in the Mills close by for which the workers are too often fined by the Mill authorities resulting in the reduction of their monthly earnings. In the face of all these facts the Government have had no compunction to sanction the location of one more shop on this locality, which is unnecessary and uncalled for.

Further, the sanction accorded is in direct contravention of a definite undertaking given by the Government that no liquor shops will be located anywhere near a Mill or School or place of Public Worship. The proposed shop is to be located just in front of the Prahlad Mills. Besides this there are seven mills on this road in close proximity. There are a number of Municipal Schools on this Road. There is also a Mohammedan Mosque and one or two temples. All these are within arm's length from the place where the new shop is to be opened. Therefore this shop will constitute another menace to the Schools and places of public worship.

Not only this. The Government of Bombay openly declared in the Legislative Council in most definite and unequivocal terms that the Government stood for the policy of Prohibition within twenty years. Later events have, however, shown that the Government whatever their intentions when they made this declaration, are not carrying out that policy. Making Excise a transferred subject and putting it under the control of a Minister responsible to the Legislature has had no effect in changing the policy of the Government.

The Bombay Government's activities in this field have been actuated by a single thought, more by financial considerations than by the interests of the people. As matters stand at present there is not a ray of hope of the Government altering their policy a bit in the interest of the masses. Of the total number of shops in this City, an overwhelming majority of them are located in areas inhabited by the poor workers quite disproportionate to the requirements of the place.

There is no reason to expect the Government to do anything now or ever to do away with the drink evil. That is no reason, however, why other responsible public bodies and the leaders of public opinion should view the problem with equanimity. The removal of the drink evil itself will relieve the victims much of the rigour of a miserable life, improve their economic condition, health and physique, reduce sickness and death rate among them, make them more sober and sensible enough to think of and work for a better and more promising future and last but not the least important, enable them to lead a life much nearer to that of a human being, thereby building up a better society. But so long as the Government persist in following their present Excise Policy, there is no hope of salvation for the workers. Therefore it is high time that the leaders of all shades of public opinion and all responsible public bodies rose to the occasion and making this a common issue offered a united front against the attempt of the Government to stultify their own avowed policy of Total Prohibition with a view to eradicate the evil of drink from the country. As this evil is more rampant among the workers it is the bounden duty of all the labour leaders and the Trade Unions in the Bombay City to unite on this question and to effectively counteract the menace in right earnest without any further delay. The growing poverty among the masses and the growing strength of the unemployed day by day with facilities and opportunities to keep them always under the influence of liquor is creating a situation which is rapidly heading to a crisis quite detrimental to the interest of society which will no doubt be put out of gear.

THE RELIGIOUS PARLIAMENT IDEA.*

(BY GUSTAVE CARUS.)

Monday, September 12, 1893. The World's First Parliament of Religions. Made Opening Address of Welcome. Scene and proceedings majestic and awe inspiring beyond words.

This is the notation in the diary of the Honorable Charles Carroll Bonney on that memorable eleventh day of September when men and women representing all the religions sat together in brotherly union on the same platform, each one to present the greatest and best of his faith. The Parliament of Religions was the chief one among some two hundred congresses held that summer in Chicago in connection with the World's Columbian Exposition, and its tremendous success made it a landmark in the history of religion.

The plan of holding a series of congresses which would represent the spirit or soul of the material exhibits of the Exposition was originated by Mr. Bonney, one of the foremost western lawyers at that time. Mr. Bonney proposed the congresses to show the achievements of the human mind in science, literature, education, religion, and other departments of human activity. The plan was adopted, and he was made President of the World's Congress Auxiliary. The motto adopted by this committee was "Not matter, but mind; not things, but men." For two years the committee worked with endless patience and tact to realize their plans.

There was a congress devoted to social reform, to women, to labour, to the various sciences, professions, and businesses. Religion was represented by forty-one denominational and inter-denominational conventions which were followed by what became the centre of interest, the World's First Parliament of Religions. Great religious gatherings had taken place before, but none equalled this. The Council of Nicea included only Christians. The Congress summoned at Patliputra (now Patna) was composed entirely of Buddhists. The Emperor Akbar attempted to bring together the leaders and teachers of all the religions of his realm, but he was summoning them as ruler and prophet of his new religion. Now for the first time in history, the exponents of all religions came together in a spirit of brotherhood, not to argue and dispute, but to meet in friendly fellowship. The invitations stated that the purpose was "not to denounce but to announce, not to debate but to confer, not to decree but to consult." The rules provided that "the speakers will..... state their own beliefs and reasons for them with the greatest frankness, without however employing unfriendly criticism of other faiths."

With a few exceptions the whole world accepted the invitation. The only important men who declined to participate or to be represented were the Archbishop of Canterbury, Primate of All England, and the Sultan of Turkey, in his capacity of Caliph or Moslem Primate. The opposition of the Sultan caused little surprise, but it was regretted because a number of Islamic scholars who had hoped to participate, felt compelled to remain absent, and the Bishops of the Greek and Armenian churches in the Turkish Empire were much embarrassed by his attitude. The opposition of the Archbishop, however, was unexpected, for he not only refused to accept the invitation, but even refused to write a letter expressing his approval of the Parliament. His chief reason was that, since he considered Christianity the one religion, taking part in the congress would be admitting the equality of others and the parity of their position and claims. The Committee regretted this attitude, for they had no intention of committing the participants in the congress to admitting the equality of religions or the parity of claims; they merely wished to have all creeds meet in parliamentary equality.

Father Hyacinth in the Contemporary (July, 1893) entered fully into the spirit of the invitation where he wrote, "It is not true that all religions are equally good but neither is it true that all religions except one are no good at all." While the Parliament was in preparation, misgivings were felt even by those who were friendly to the idea, for it seemed that the difficulties in the way would prove too great. The New York Tribune said on July 8, that the coming Parliament "can hardly expect the success it deservesmany Christians refuse to have anything to do with it, while many of these who will take part in it look upon it as a tournament in which it is to be the duty of Christianity to prove that no other religion has in it any element of truth or usefulness. Such a spirit is unfortunate and must seriously interfere with the good result of the gathering...But if the tangible results of the Parliament of Religions should not be as great as expected, the fact that it was held at all, will mark an era in the religious history of the world. It will diffuse a truer knowledge of the religious problem and will tend to make the adherents of all religions more charitable in their judgments of other faiths."

The final great success of the Parliament was perhaps due more than anything else to the fortunate combination of the two leaders Mr. Charles Carroll Bonney, President of the World's Congress Auxiliary, and Dr. John Henry Barrows, the Chairman of the Parliament of Religions. Both were men of deeply religious character, with judicial minds, firmness, and tact. Then also, the time was right, and the occasion was auspicious.

The Parliament was held in the Columbus Hall of the Art Institute before an audience of four thousand people. The spirit of good will and brotherhood in the exchange of religious thoughts predominated overwhelmingly over both delegates and listeners. There were only a few discordant notes but these were handled with such diplomacy and tact by the Chairman that no quarrels or hard feeling resulted. The liberal, tolerant, and gentle spirit of the Oriental religions did much to soften the aggressive religions, "breathing the brotherhood of man as well as the fatherhood of God." A platform was sought which would be broad enough to embrace all the religions. There were many present who, before the Parliament, knew very little about Brahma or the religion of Buddha, and this was their first introduction to a knowledge of comparative religions. To many, too, it was a shock to learn that the introduction of Christianity by the missions was often demoralizing, and that the spirit of the missionaries was not always one of meekness and unselfishness. Throughout the entire session there were evidences of a change in the attitude from dogmatic religions and iron-bound creeds towards unity of all nature and the brotherhood of man.

After the close of the Parliament, in order to keep the spirit it had fostered alive, the Religious Parliament Extension was organized. Mr. Bonney was President and Dr. Paul Carus, the late editor of the Open Court, was Secretary. Dr. Carus was in close sympathy with the ideals of the Parliament. The Open Court stood for "Liberty of Thought, Freedom of Conscience, the earnest pursuit of the Truth, and loyalty to the Truth under all circumstances. In 1900, a closer bond was made, and the Open Court devoted its pages not only to The Science of Religion and the Religion of Science, but also to the "Extension of the Religious Parliament Idea."

A direct outcome of the Parliament of Religion was the founding of the John Henry Barrow's Lectures and the Haskell Lectures at the University of Chicago, and also the establishing of a centre at Greenacre, Eliot, Maine by Miss Farmer where for many years a group of men and women carried on the work begun in Chicago.

The Religious Parliament Idea is still active after forty years. This past July the Haskell Institute on Modern Trends in World Religions met in the Assembly Room of the Oriental Institute at the University of Chicago and scholars representing the six great world religions, Christianity, Judaism, Islam, Buddhism, Confucianism and Hinduism, under the able leadership of Professor A. Eustace Haydon, presented the tendencies in these religions today toward modern scientific thinking, and in adapting themselves to changing social and economic conditions. It was generally conceded that the liberal religions of the Orient had less adjustment to make in meeting the requirements of scientific thought and social change.

With the same spirit but with a different approach, the World's Fellowship of Faiths is seeking to "unite the inspiration of all faiths upon the solution of Man's Present Problems," in a "Second Parliament of Religions." From August 27 to September 17, at an afternoon and evening session eminent leaders of thought from all over the world are speaking on these problems. Great credit must be given to the two chief executives of this organization Mr. Charles Weller and Mr. Kedernath Das Gupta, for making possible these meetings in spite of almost insurmountable difficulties. The proceedings, if collected and published, would give a unique picture of conditions today from widely varied points of view.

Perhaps, however, the greatest and most important result of the First Parliament of Religions is that intangible, unorganized spirit of toleration and mutual understanding which has spread so widely and gained so many adherents since that memorable event forty years ago.

A BOMBAY GOVERNMENT PRESS NOTE.*

The Municipal Commissioner for the City of Bombay having received an application for his permission under Section 440 of the City of Bombay Municipal Act to cremate the remains of the late Mr. Vithalbhaj J. Patel at Chowpatty has submitted the request for the orders of Government under Sub-section (2) of Section 440 of the Act. For the reasons stated below, the Government of Bombay have decided to refuse their sanction to the grant of permission.

The application is probably based on the precedent created by the cremation at Chowpatty of the remains of the late Mr. B. G. Tilak. On that occasion permission was necessarily given at very short notice and without sufficient time for full consideration of the implications and consequences of granting the permission. The Government decision on the present occasion is based on experience gained subsequent to the cremation of Mr. Tilak's remains.

After the cremation of Mr. Tilak's body, complaints and rumours were current that the scene of the cremation had been desecrated. Whether true or false, the rumours indicated the unsuitability of an open public site for cremation purposes in a city like Bombay, especially in cases where the deceased had been prominent in public life.

When permission was given for the cremation of the body of Mr. Tilak it was granted on the understanding that no enclosure should be made or memorial erected. Later, it was found impracticable to maintain this condition. In May 1924, the Municipal Corporation of Bombay requested that the site of the cremation should be properly protected by means of an iron railing. In response to this request Government directed that the site of the cremation should be protected by an iron railing but the President of the Corporation was informed that this was done on the clear understanding that the case was not to be taken as a precedent and that it would not be possible for Government to consider favourably any further requests of a similar nature. In the following year, however, the Municipal Corporation again approached Government for permission that the site should be used for the erection of a memorial of Mr. Tilak. This permission was also granted. The Committee in charge of the arrangements thereupon made a further request for an additional area of roughly 100 square yards for the purpose of erecting a monument, and ultimately an additional area for this purpose was granted as well.

It is evident, therefore, that, although the present application makes no request for a memorial on the site of the cremation nevertheless if permission were granted for the cremation of the remains of the late Mr. Vithalbhaj J. Patel at Chowpatty, requests are likely to follow that the site should be fenced off and that permission to erect a memorial on it should be given. It might be difficult not to grant these requests.

With a second precedent for the cremation of a prominent Hindu political leader on Chowpatty sands and possibly the erection later on the site of a monument or memorial, similar requests would probably be made on similar occasions in the future and the tendency would be for their scope to be enlarged. It would be difficult also to refuse similar permission if asked for in the case of a Hindu prominent in spheres other than politics, for example, philanthropy or industry. In any event, it would inevitably be a delicate matter in each case for Government to decide whether or not permission realp for cremation should be granted. There would also be a tendency in each case for the friends of the deceased to ask permission for the erection of a memorial on the site of the cremation. The place would, therefore, tend to become not only a Hindu burning ground but also a Hindu mausoleum.

In the opinion of Government it is undesirable to encourage any tendency to convert the Chowpatty foreshore to these purposes. It has long been a popular resort of all classes and creeds in Bombay and its area is limited. The convenience and sentiments of the residents in the locality must also be taken into consideration. Finally, it is undesirable that questions connected with the disposal of the remains of prominent Hindus should, in any respect, become a subject of discussion to be decided by Government. If a second public cremation were now permitted at Chowpatty, questions of this kind are bound to recur. Government are satisfied that due respect to prominent members of the Hindu community can be adequately and suitably paid after death on all occasions without the special use of the foreshore at Chowpatty. In these circumstances, they have decided not to grant permission for the public cremation of the remains of the late Mr. Vithalbhaj J. Patel on the Chowpatty foreshore.

It may be added that there are circumstances and conditions connected with the admission of a dead body into India and the opening of a coffin after arrival which might make it desirable or necessary to refuse permission for opening the coffin or cremating the remains in a public place. In view of the reasons given above, it has not been considered necessary to deal with this aspect of the present case in a press note.

GERMANY AND INDIA.

The Ceylon correspondent of the Times of India writes:—

One of the most furious controversies in Ceylon—in the press, on the platform, in the State Council and no doubt, in the parlour, raged during the whole of last month over the proposed colour-bar legislation in Germany.

The participants in it were Reuters, the Ceylon State Council, the German Consul for Ceylon and South India, Herr Von Pochhammer, and a countless number of press correspondents, both Ceylonese and Germans. The controversy started when Reuters wired a brief message from Berlin "that the Prussian Minister for Justice had declared in a Memorandum that marriages between Germans and coloured people could be made a punishable offence and included in the German Penal Code."

As soon as this was published there was a tremendous uproar in Ceylon. Mr. George de Silva, State Council Member for Kandy, gave notice to introduce a motion which read "in view of the racial and colour legislation that is being introduced into Germany, in the opinion of this Council, the sale and importation of German goods into this island should be forthwith banned and prohibited."

Press correspondents signing themselves "Black Aryans" or "Native Patriot" or such resounding titles criticised the German action and the editors of the local papers were hard pressed for space for the extraordinary number of letters they received and had to use their editorial prerogatives with a prominent "This correspondence is now closed."

When the German Battleship Koeln was in Colombo the Captain held a social function to which he had invited about 60 Ceylonese, but (as he told me in the interview) only about 30 attended the function, the others kept away.

The excitement rose to such heights that the Consul had to take the unprecedented step of writing a letter to the Ceylon Government explaining the real state of affairs in Germany and requesting them to place the facts before the members of State Council before any motion for boycott of German goods were passed.

The Times of India representative had an exclusive interview with the German Consul in which Herr Von Pochhammer traced at length the colour bar question in Germany.

The Reuters' version was that "The proposal that future marriages between Germans and non-Aryans should be declared invalid whilst intimate relations between a German man or woman and member of non-Aryan race should be a punishable offence for both parties is made by the Prussian Minister of Justice in a memorandum on the necessity for a German penal code on Nazi lines."

The Consul remarking upon this said that such legislation was only proposed and had not been passed and if at all it is to be passed it would be done not before 1934.

Asked to explain if there was any foundation for such a report, he said that in Germany at present the Central Legislature had appointed many committees to enquire into different questions. One of these was the committee of some expert lawyers charged with the task of making a new penal code for Germany.

Many German organizations had submitted memorandums to these Commissions, and one of these memorandums had been submitted by the German Association of the National-Socialistic Lawyers, which held its annual meeting this year at Leipzig.

Among the other topics discussed in this meeting, the question was discussed whether or how far the demands of racial eugenics could possibly become the subject of future legislation. As a contribution to these discussions Herr Kerl the Prussian Minister of Justice presented to the gathering a memorandum dealing with the eventual reform of the German penal code.

Some of the suggestions contained in it had been the cause of the Reuter's message. The memorandum dealing with social intercourse merely suggested to forbid it in "as far as the natural sentiments of the population would be hurt or unseemly behaviour of either party in public."

He emphatically denied that this law to forbid social intercourse between Germans and coloured people constituted any part of the German legislation as yet.

Questioned whether, if such a legislation was passed, it would be applied to Indians and others, he said that the legislation was primarily directed against two types of people in Germany and had no reference outside.

First of all there were the Jews who were not considered Aryans, secondly there were Negroes settled in Germany. The legislation was directed against these two.

As an explanation to the presence of the Negroes, the consul said, "After the Great War Negro soldiers who had bravely fought for Germany in East Africa applied to our Home Government, requesting that they might be allowed to settle in Germany, as East Africa had become distasteful to them after their defeat. When the Negro soldiers arrived in Germany they were mostly given Government jobs in all parts of Germany. They became very popular."

The decree when it is passed will only be directed against these nationals and not against any one else.

NAZI REVOLUTION.

Dr. Heinz Nitschke, speaking on the German revolution at Calcutta, said that it was neither sudden nor unexpected. He compared the present German revolution to the historic French revolution. He warned his hearers against believing that the German revolution was merely political in character. "The aim of the present regime," explained the speaker, "is to establish a corporate State where sectional interests are entirely subjected to the supreme interests of the whole."

Discussing the causes of the present upheaval Dr. Nitzschke remarked that they were both external and internal. Among the former were the Versailles treaty and the Reparations agreement which he averred were "unbearable and lowered the self-respect of the German nation." The internal causes of the revolution were (1) the postwar German youths' attitude, (2) the danger of communism, and (3) the supremacy established in every sphere of life by Jews and other outsiders. The speaker admitted that these alone could not explain the completeness of the change. Dr. Nitzschke told "The Hindu" representative that his visit to India, which was under the German Indian Academy's auspices, was undertaken with the object of the promotion of a better understanding between the youths of the two countries and the study of Indian conditions generally. He added that his intention was to take back with him a number of Indian students to enable them to study Germany first hand.

SWAMI YATISWARANANDA.

Swami Yatiswarananda sailed from Bombay by S. S. Conte Rossa on the 23rd of October last for Wiesbaden in Germany. Some time ago, a group of sincere souls appealed to the Ramakrishna Mission for sending a Vedanta teacher for guidance and instructions in their spiritual life. The authorities of the Mission selected Swami Yatiswarananda and have sent him as a Vedanta teacher and their representative.

The Swami joined the Ramakrishna Order in 1911 and became a monastic member at the Ramakrishna Math, Mylapore, Madras. He worked there with untiring zeal for a number of years and came in close contact with the towering personality of Swami Brahmananda, the first President of the Order. In 1920, he came to Benares and got the privilege of serving and intimately mixing with Swami Turiyananda, a direct disciple of Sri Ramakrishna. In 1921, he was asked to be editor of the Prabuddha Bharata which he conducted with great ability for about four years. After that, he took charge of the Ramakrishna Math, Bombay and put it on a secure basis. In 1926, he again went to Madras—this time as President of the Ramakrishna Math and the Ramakrishna Mission Students' Home, Madras. He edited the Vedanta Kesari for several years with considerable success, and greatly increased the number of publications of the Ramakrishna Math, Madras. In 1929, he became a member of the Governing Body of the Ramakrishna Mission.

The Swami is endowed with a good many qualities of head and heart. He is a scholar, versed in Western and Eastern philosophy. He is a fine speaker and an able writer. His deep spirituality, winning manners, feeling heart and catholic views have won for him numerous friends and admirers in India and abroad. His monastic career is full of activities for the good of mankind. We feel sure, a spiritual person like him will act as a torch-bearer to many in his new field of activity. Our sincere good wishes and prayer for his noble mission abroad!—The Prabuddha Bharata.

NOTES.

The Persuasive Method:—We publish in another column a report of Gandhiji's visit to Deoli, a village near Nagpur, in the course of his present tour on behalf of the removal of untouchability. On a show of hands—a very unsatisfactory way of ascertaining public sentiment in a question of this kind—Gandhiji found that a large majority of the crowd that had come to welcome him favoured the admission of untouchables to the local temple. But he was not satisfied that this was sufficient sanction for effecting the reform then and there and wisely advised the trustees to convince their colleagues who dissented from them of the rightness of their own view in favour of temple entry. This is the right attitude to take and Gandhiji's forbearance would secure the approbation of reformers who, like ourselves, are intensely sceptical of the efficacy of some earlier methods. By this act the Sanatanists, as they like to call themselves, have been put on their defence. The Hindu community as a whole is intellectually convinced of the urgency of this and other reforms having for their object the complete removal of untouchability. It was somewhat alarmed by the iconoclastic methods which find favour with some leaders. Now that Gandhiji has shown that he relies solely on persuasion and will have nothing to do with coercive ideas, the Sanatanists who seek to obstruct the reform by such silly tactics as those adopted at Deoli, will receive no sympathy from the great mass of Hindus. If they do not understand that by their opposition they are imperilling the integrity of the Hindu religion which they profess with so little reason to defend, their knowledge of the world forces at work to regenerate society is seriously defective. Gandhiji's programme on the present lines has our whole-hearted support and we should consider it a national misfortune if it does not achieve the object with which it is undertaken at no little personal discomfort so soon after his recent protracted convalescence.

Pandit Jawaharlal and the Hindu Mahasabha: Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru addressing the students of the Hindu University at Benares bitterly attacked the Hindu Mahasabha for the resolution which it passed at Ajmere invoking the help of the League of Nations in securing their rights to the Hindus in the new Indian Constitution. This, as we pointed out at the time, is wholly misconceived. The League's prestige is at its lowest ebb—Signor Mussolini described it as absurd this week—and it is the very last body to which a body like the Mahasabha should turn for help. The Hindu community is an overwhelming majority of the population and if it is competently led, no power on earth can prevent it from being the determining factor in Indian life. The first thing to do is to give up looking to outside help, whether of the League of Nations or of British politicians. The Hindu Mahasabha has a great task before it and we are not without hope that its leaders will soon realise that the main need of the Hindus at the moment are not to be secured by political methods. Pandit Jawaharlal's denunciation of the Mahasabha as run by a clique and of the leaders as enemies of nationalism, is unjust and improper. As for the Mahasabha representing only a small minority of Hindus, the Pandit, it may be retorted, represents a still smaller minority as his views on religion are such as can be shared only by persons who are known as Hindus because they cannot be called by any other name.

Bombay's Mill Industry.—Governors' speeches are too often platitudinous. They say much but mean little. There are occasional exceptions, of course. The speech which Sir Fredrick Sykes made in reply to the toast of his health at the farewell banquet given to him by the Millowners' Association, is one of them. We are sure that there are millowners who can appreciate the frankness with which His Excellency laid his finger on the weak spots of their policy of self-complaisance. When the excise duty on cotton cloth manufactured by them had to be attacked they made full use of the slogan of national industries. At other times they have sailed under other flags. This the country has found out and hence the jealousy with which Bombay industrialists are regarded in other provinces. Sir Fredrick Sykes is laying down his office next month and it would have been pleasanter for him, and for his hosts, to have confined his remarks to conventional compliments. That he did not do so, and spoke as he did, is the best proof of his abiding interest in the welfare of the Bombay industry. We doubt, however, if His Excellency did well in holding out hopes of a revival of prosperity for Bombay mills. Nearly twenty years ago, the late Sir Dorab Tata advised that no more mills should be erected in Bombay, as the conditions which made the industry prosperous in this city, had nearly all disappeared, or would soon disappear. He advised that all future mills should be erected in the districts.

Jews in Germany:—We reproduce today at some length the important parts of the report of the Foreign Policy Association of New York on the position of Jews in Germany. There has been so much of the propagandistic element in the allegations which have been made during recent months, that fair-minded persons hesitated to accept them without independent testimony to corroborate them. The Foreign Policy Association's reports, as we have had occasion often to mention, are models of dispassionate and impartial statement. The report on the position of German Jews as usual, is carefully documented though some of the authorities are not official. Some, perhaps several, of the measures adopted by the German Government against the Jews have analogies in other countries, not excluding our own. But all of them taken together, form a cumulative indictment which Germany will find it difficult to justify to the world. We are glad that, as the result of the overwhelming support which the German Government has received from the people by their votes on the referendum, the Chancellor has found himself in a position to order a general amnesty for political prisoners and is said to be contemplating an early revision of the measures against Jews. An important Jewish commercial association has declared that it is the duty of Jews to co-operate with Government in restoring German prosperity. We trust that the present tension between Nazis and Jews will soon be replaced by mutual trust and that Germany will revert to her traditional and, we may add, Aryan policy of equality of treatment of all religious communities.

Professor Conger:—Professor George P. Conger who has kindly contributed his first thoughts on this country, under the heading "Some obstacles to Social Reform" is Professor of Philosophy in Minnesota University. He is not a stranger to Asia as he was engaged in relief work in China and Siberia some years ago. He is now on study leave most of which he intends to spend in India. He is very much interested in the contemporary relations between philosophy and religion, and his recent writings, Professor Gilkey considers, are a definite contribution to American philosophical thinking. Mrs. Conger who accompanies her husband, is a student of Arts and Crafts and has already made a good beginning in her researches on these lines in Bombay.

Purdah Nuns:—The Examiner is mistaken in thinking that our observations about the importation of cloistered nuns into this country arose from its description of them as "purdah" nuns. Its explanation that they are only a small body and that they have assumed the purdah voluntarily does not meet our criticism. The point of it was that for probably the first time India will now have in her midst western women who regard seclusion from men's vision as an act sanctified by the Christian religion.

Hitler and Vivisection:—Progress Today, the well-known anti-vivisection paper of England, writes:—"The stirring news which was published in the European and American Press in August naturally roused feelings of exhilaration and gratitude in the hearts of all those who regard vivisection, not only as cruel and degrading, but as a definite obstacle to progress in the art of healing. Vivisection forbidden in Prussia! thus ran the message telegraphed from Berlin announcing that the Premier of Prussia, General Göring, had issued an Order forbidding vivisection in Prussia and providing imprisonment in Concentration Camps for anyone who in defiance of the Order continued the practice. "Too good to be true," was the reflection of those really conversant with the strength and ramifications of the prevailing system of vivisectional research, a system which is backed and maintained by powerful and well organised financial interests. The sequel to the first Order, a modification and reversal, which finally reduced the "prohibition" to mild restriction has shown that the fears were well justified. Numerous letters from German friends rejoicing in the Order reached the Offices of the Society in London and in Geneva. Many pointed out that Hitler is a friend of animals and a vegetarian and drew attention to his statement, made in a letter to Dr. Eckhard, of Hanover (Chairman of the German Medical Anti-Vivisection Union), that in the new Germany vivisectional cruelties would not be tolerated."

tion of the imperialist methods of the past. In the circumstances it is inspiring to learn that the number of internationally minded—we prefer the word to cosmopolitan—men is larger than before. For a long time to come, however, their work and influence will be largely outside politics. We do not think that the entire world will turn socialist. Nor would that end be an entirely desirable one.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1933.

THE FUTURE OF EUROPE.

Present-day Europe stands today as near to war as she has ever come before. The League of Nations which was originally formed with the purpose of preventing war, and as an instrument of arbitration in international disputes, has doubtless achieved signal success in the social sphere but the failure of the Disarmament Conference marks its shortcomings. The European situation is changing rapidly from day to day and it is difficult if not impossible to present an analysis at any particular point. Mr. and Mrs. Cole's recent publication, "The Intelligent Man's Review of Europe To-day,"* has to a certain extent been left behind by the rapid development of events. As an analysis of the trends of modern European thought, however, "The Intelligent Man's Review" is an admirable production. In estimating the contribution of Fascist Italy to the Labour question, the Coles remark that wages have fallen and that the industrial worker in Italy has, therefore, very little to congratulate himself on. A corrective to this viewpoint, however, is furnished in Mr. Knickerbocker's recent book, "Can Europe recover?" Commenting on the Italian situation, he writes that only about 2% are unemployed in Italy, that the average Italian is eating more and better food today than he has ever done in history, that beggars have disappeared and that the currency is stable. An interview, which he had with Rossoni, a Fascist labour leader and Mussolini's right-hand man in Italy, throws some light on the position of labour under the Fascist Regime. The working men, as he points out in contrast to the impression conveyed by "The Intelligent Man's Review," are more strongly Fascist than the bourgeoisie. "If it is true", writes Mr. Knickerbocker, "that Fascism is a system of insurance whereby the capitalist pays a premium to the Government for security of property, it appears that the Government here, at any rate, has turned the premium over to labour." One thing is clear. The authors have their own political theories which lend a bias particularly to those sections of the book which deal with Italian Fascism or German Nazism. In the presentation of facts this bias is kept well under control. In the estimate of contributions to the cultural and economic development of Europe, no secret is made of their aversion to these systems.

Europe for the purposes of the "Intelligent Man's Review" is divided politically in three parts: Great Britain, Soviet Russia and the rest. The countries of Continental Europe have presented a united front to Bolshevik Russia. As for the Communism which exists in Soviet Russia the Coles point out that it is most unlikely to become "the instrument of social transformation in the west." Even as a system capable of adaptation to the needs of other countries the authors dismiss any prospect of European acceptance by the remark that their methods create a danger of nationalist reaction in the shape of Fascism. The ideal solution to the problems of modern Europe is "an international socialism, a force making definitely for world peace an international collaboration." The Coles are under no delusion as to the practical methods through which the end is to be worked for. They assert that the recovery of capitalism can only be brought about at a cost far exceeding its value, but they point out also that though the capitalist state must be broken, the socialists of the world will have to work, at any rate for some time to come, within the framework of these states. To achieve progress in the direction of socialism it is necessary to convey to the masses of the world the importance of socialism as the only desirable ideal. That doubtless is the object behind this stupendous volume. Yet to the impartial reader it must necessarily be borne in that in their analysis of European movements the authors have not made due allowance for the national socialism which is fast gaining ground. It is possibly true that only capitalism in its decay brings forth Communism or Fascism. Yet both these political theories present more energetic programmes than the barren creed of international commonsense.

That European statesmen are unable at present to think in wider terms than those of their nations, has been proved by the failure of the various world conferences that have been summoned in the past. The advice contained in the concluding part of the "Intelligent Man's Review," "Displace imperialism and set the world to formulate on the path towards fuller use of the productive resources at its command; and the mental reversion of national hatred and suspicion will at once disappear, setting the world free to embark upon the course of constructive collaboration," may be the moral of the present situation in Europe. It is very unlikely to be acted upon, however, for a long time to come. The "Intelligent Man's Review" is a well-conceived introduction to European politics. It gives the historical background in the earlier chapters and concludes with a detailed survey of modern trends. For all that, however, there is one defect which must strike even the casual reader. Europe today can only be understood against the background of Asia and America. American intervention in the war has roused the European consciousness of her citizens who tend more and more to look to the countries from which their ancestors migrated. Besides, there is the debt question. The Asiatic colonies of some European powers have helped temporarily at any rate to stave off the present crisis. All these contribute towards a continua-

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA—X.
SOCIAL MOVEMENTS IN MODERN INDIA.

The Haskell Lectureship was founded with the object of promoting a true understanding of the East by the West. Its counterpart, the Barrows Lectureship, was expected to help the East to understand the West. There were two Haskell lecturers this time, Dr. Hu Shi from China and myself for India. Till recently the object of the lectureships was sought to be advanced by a comparative presentation of the several religions. It was a step forward when it was decided to extend the scope of the lectures to the reactions of the religious communities of Asia to western ideas and influence.

Unlike at the Institute where I was speaking for Hinduism, in the Haskell lectures I was speaking for India, that is, for all the religious communities of India. It was possible for me to do this because there has been a remarkable continuity in the social evolution of India notwithstanding political convulsions and foreign conquest. Not only has there been this continuity, which is the keynote of Indian history, but, and, in fact, as a consequence of it, there was also an equally remarkable underlying unity in respect of all important social problems created by contact with the west. This was the theme of my first lecture and it was enforced and illustrated in the other lectures with reference to each of these problems.

Lord Acton has said that there was a sharp line of demarcation between the history of modern and medieval Europe. There was no such distinction between ancient, medieval and modern Indian history. Up to the time of the Mohammedan conquest foreign invaders and immigrants were absorbed into Hindu society. Moslem rule did not materially affect the social life of the people. Modern ideas operated in India through three main channels: British administration, English education and Christian Missions. The idealistic side of Western culture appealed to the Indian mind more than its materialistic aspects. The English language and literature were eagerly studied as being the language and literature of freedom. The life and teachings of Jesus Christ were accepted but organised Christianity was rejected as incompatible with Indian tradition. Social movements in India have remained fundamentally religious. The great Indian leaders were leaders of social as well as religious reform.

The second lecture was devoted to a description of the structure of Indian society, which was substantially similar in all communities and caste. The caste system was Hindu in its origin, but it has greatly influenced all the other communities in India. The Indian Moslems were divided into castes and the Christians were not free from them. The Parsis and the Jews were castes, i. e., they do not admit of converts and they do not intermarry with other communities. Even in other matters, there is a great deal in common between communities, for instance, the Age of Consent Committee found that child marriages prevailed among Moslems and Christians, though to a less extent than among Hindus. The prohibition against widow re-marriage was observed among the higher class Muslims, which the late Begum of Bhopal explained as an old Afghan tradition. Caste, at the present day, has ceased to possess most of its old powers and has become mainly an endogamous group.

In the third lecture, I described the untouchables, their position in different parts of the country and the movements for their uplift and Mahatma Gandhi's part in them. It was just previous to this lecture that I had word from an Indian friend that my opinion of there being no racial difference between caste Hindus and untouchables, need not be pressed in my exposition of this reform.

The fourth lecture dealt with the principal reforms connected with the position of women, the abolition of the restriction of re-marriage of Hindu widows, the raising of the marriageable age, education, abolition of purdah, the amendment of the laws of property relating to women, abolition of prostitution, the devadasi system, and the importance of the women's movement in India.

In the fifth lecture, I dwelt on certain subsidiary reforms, such as the removal of the ban on foreign travel, Temperance and Social Purity. Incidentally I referred to the repeal of the Prohibition law in the United States. Though the conditions in India and the States were entirely different owing to the difference in the public sentiment on the question, opponents of Prohibition would make the most of America's backsliding as an argument against Prohibition in India. In the last lecture, I gave a brief account of the lives of eminent leaders of the Indian social reform movement beginning with Raja Ram Mohan Roy.

The Haskell lectures are to be published by the University of Chicago. I have very briefly indicated here the main heads of my observations. The first lecture was delivered on the 31st July. Professor Frederick Woodward, Vice-President of the University, took the chair and introduced me in a few words. It was a hot day and referring to it he remarked that it was no more than what the Hocking Commission, of which he was a member, encountered when they landed in Bombay.

One great obstacle, in fact I may say the greatest, to an understanding of India by the West is the misconception amongst the latter that the people of India are entirely different in their outlook from themselves. This is particularly widespread in America. I did my best to remove this misimpression by telling the people there that the people of India were neither more spiritual nor less materialistic than the people of America. Indians may talk more of religion and Americans more of wealth; but in practical life the chief pre-occupation of both was how to get on in life. Mention has been made of some of the occasions when I had to repudiate the notion that I was a prince. I had also to make it clear that I was not a Swami, or a Sadhu or a Yogi or a fortune-teller. It is most unfortunate that the idea of Indians being metaphysicians and mystics has taken a strong hold of the American mind.

At the conclusion of my last lecture two or three women from the audience came up to me, and requested me to deliver some lectures to their group on Metaphysics. I told them that I knew very little of the subject but, as they seemed to think that I was too modest and that every man from India was an expert metaphysician, I further added that in any case I had not the time to spare as I was leaving Chicago the next day.

As usual, Professor Haydon drove us back to our hotel. Kamakoti was inside the car with Mrs. Haydon and I sat next to the driver's seat. Kamakoti learnt from Mrs. Haydon that their home was in Canada and that they were leaving for Canada on the next day. She told me this, whereupon Professor Haydon exclaimed "The same Empire." There would be no Indian problem if there was a common citizenship for all who belong to the British Commonwealth of Nations.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

One of the most interesting visits during our stay in Chicago was to the Everetts in their home at Hinsdale some 25 miles from the city. Mr. Everett is one of the leading lawyers of Chicago. Mrs. Everett is a fervent Buddhist of the Zen sect and has a beautiful little shrine with a bronze image of the Sakyamuni at the centre, which reminded me of the similar but larger shrine in Dr. Nair's home in Lamington Road. She was to have gone to Japan last month to spend the next eight months in a cottage which she has taken near the principal temple of the sect. She spoke with great reverence of the Japanese sage who was her guru and under whose guidance she would practice the tenets of Zen (Sanskrit, dhyana) in seclusion. The Everetts have a charming daughter, a typical American girl, who will accompany her mother to Japan. We were rather a large party and what particularly struck us was the easy grace with which we, Indians and Americans alike, were made welcome. Mr. Everett showed us all over the house except the shrine which was reserved as Mrs. Everett's province.

There was a large attendance of guests of various nationalities at a dinner at the International House to which we were invited by the Superintendent, Mr. Dixon, and Mrs. Dixon. After dinner a Korean boy played with great feeling on a violincello. I was told that the Koreans have taken to western music with much zest. I made a short speech dwelling on the value of these International Homes for promoting good will among nations.

Another International centre in Chicago is Brent Hall presided over by Miss Biller. We were invited to tea at this place. There were quite a number of Indians present. Miss Biller is held in high esteem by our people there and several of them told me that they were grateful to her for her uniform friendliness to Indian students. One incident of this function has stuck in my memory. An Indian student of the Theological College here sang a Tamil hymn. I asked him where it was from. He said, it was from the Shiva Puran. This is another instance of Indian Christians in America cherishing the culture of their ancestral faith.

Dr. Manshardt of Neighbourhood House at Byculla had given me letters of introduction to several of his friends in Chicago where he had himself been a student and Professor for some time. Owing to the great pressure of our engagements I could deliver none of them. But we had the privilege of being the guests of one of these friends at Chicago. Mr. Rowell with his wife and daughter, the latter a student of Comparative Religion and well up in the literature of Hinduism, had come on purpose from Hinsdale as we were unable to visit them at their home owing to another engagement. We cherish among the most valued memories of our stay in Chicago, our visit to Hull House, the world famous centre of social service. Miss Jane Addams was not in town but, when she learnt of our desire to call on her, she came down to Chicago. We were shown all round the place by one of her assistants, a college graduate, who told us that she had come to work under Miss Addams during the summer vacation. We had tea with Miss Addams and she spoke of her visit to India some years ago. We were deeply dimpressed by the reverence in which Miss Addams is held by all classes. A large crowd was waiting to have what we in India call darshan of the lady who ranks among the pioneers of the Woman's Movement.

SOME OBSTACLES TO SOCIAL REFORM.

(By Prof. George P. Conger of Minnesota University).

My only excuse for offering these brief reflections concerning social reform is that during my first few days in India they have been suggested principally by questions which have been asked me about America. When compared with India it seems absurd to call anything in America old, but I suppose it will be admitted, after all, that America is older than India when it is a question of experience with some political institutions and social movements.

When I think of America's experience I am impressed first by the fact that a social reform is not achieved when its principle is triumphantly written into the statutes. The Negro problem in America, for instance, was not solved when Lincoln proclaimed emancipation, nor when the Civil War was won on that issue. One would think that this experience would have been enough to drive the lesson home, but the recent fiasco of prohibition legislation shows the same weak reliance upon documents and enacted formulae. Perhaps since America has failed twice to see the point, it may not be amiss that Indian reformers, struggling with their own problems, should be urged to think about it carefully.

Another reflection concerns liberty, whether he has it or not, none of us understands liberty very well. As a student of logic, I have often maintained that any kind of freedom, be it political, social, economic, personal, or academic, while it can be indicated or denoted, can, strictly speaking, not be fully or precisely described, and in the latter sense can not be defined. Defining is much like confining, and, especially with such a concept as "liberty," the attempt to define it always leaves a penumbra or margin not reducible to the confines of the description. It is no wonder, then, that we lack clear formulations of the principle of liberty, but in view of this very fact, it is always wise, while loving liberty and living for it, not to press liberty of any sort too far. We are most loyal to its own nature when we are content to "leave a little margin."

An Indian friend, in a recent conversation, suggested that I should understand the caste system as essentially a division of labor, a specialization of function within the social organism. We may, I think, carry this analogy further, and say that some abuses of caste in India can be understood as a disease of the social organism—I am tempted to say, a hardening of the arteries. This, again, suggests that one great difficulty in the way of truly scientific, as distinct from spasmodic, social reform in the West has been the lack of an adequate basic understanding and theory of what a society really is.

The organismic theory of society which flourished, especially in France and Germany, about the year 1900 defeated its own purposes by its extravagant analogies between organisms and societies. It was succeeded by the psychological theories which interpreted society not as an organic unit but as the manifold product of human intelligence. The latter theory has lent itself easily to pragmatic philosophies and humanistic enthusiasms, but these, I think, show signs of playing out and to-day in the West there are indications of a return to better articulated structural views—the kind of understanding of society which, in spite of misinterpretations and abuses, India has apparently never left.

The other day in an Indian village school a young man, thinking no doubt of Gandhiji's influence in India, asked me if we had any saints in American public life! (Only those who are familiar with American politics will realize how grotesque the question sounded to me). I was all the more impressed by what some one else said concerning Gandhiji—"he has spiritualised Indian politics". I asked myself the question, who has spiritualised, or who can, spiritualise American politics? Sometimes we think of Lincoln as a great spiritual force, but we see him through the vista of two generations and forget that his contemporaries piled upon him ridicule and abuse. Some of us thought at one time that Wilson had the qualities of spiritual leadership, but it appears now that if he had them he lacked the gift of imparting them. This chief obstacle to social reform here, there, and everywhere, seems to be selfishness, and the world needs to be enkindled with a flame of the spirit which will purge selfishness away.

THE ALL INDIA SWADESHI SANGHA.

The following communication has been issued to the press by the All India Swadeshi Sangha:—

When Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, the Chairman of the All-India Swadeshi Sangha, was in Bombay in August 1938, he called several meetings of various Swadeshi Propagandist Institutions in the town. After carefully considering the whole position, it was felt that Benares was not as suitable for locating the headquarters of the All India Swadeshi Sangha as important industrial centres like Calcutta or Bombay. It was ultimately decided that it would be more convenient and geographically more central to have the headquarters of the All India Swadeshi Sangha in Bombay and certain members from Bombay were added to the Committee in order to facilitate the rapid despatch of work. The present personnel of the Committee is as follows:—

Mrs. Lilavati Munshi and Mr. Vaikunth L. Mehta Joint Hon. Secretaries, and Messrs. Purshotam Jivandas, Jal A. D. Naoroji, Madhavai Mankanji Bhatt, Velji Lakhmsey Nappoo, K. Natarajan, and Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, members.

The Committee has now begun its work in Bombay and two of the Honorary General Secretaries who are in Bombay Mrs. Lilavati Munshi and Mr. V. L. Mehta, request people interested in Swadeshi work all over the country to write to the temporary headquarters of the All India Swadeshi Sangha, Swadeshi Market, Kalbadevi Road, Bombay, informing the Secretaries of what Swadeshi propaganda is being done in particular districts and advancing any suggestions they might have for a new active programme for the dissemination of the Swadeshi ideal.

It is proposed to start immediately either a weekly or fortnightly Swadeshi magazine of a popular character in which articles by well-known industrial and political leaders will be published under the editorship of an experienced editor. This will enable the All India Swadeshi Sangha to get into close touch, both directly and indirectly, with Swadeshi work in all parts of the country. After getting into touch with other provinces it is proposed to appoint sub-committees:

- (1) For the co-ordination of arrangements for the certifying of goods as Swadeshi and the publication of directories;
- (2) For the control and arrangement of dates of Swadeshi Exhibitions;
- (3) For collecting information regarding the difficulties of manufacturers, dealers, etc., in Swadeshi goods.

From time to time travelling representatives will be sent out by these committees in order to collect information first hand. After the period of organisation which is likely to take at least six months, it is hoped that prominent members of the Sangha Committee and other friends will make tours in different directions throughout the country pointing out to the people the desirability and necessity of practising Swadeshi in its various forms. In addition to these activities a special committee will be appointed which will attend to the starting of affiliated provincial and local organisations and to the creation of a chain of Swadeshi co-operative societies of manufacturers, dealers and consumers throughout the country. An Industrial Advisory Board will also be started. The function of this Board will be to collect detailed information about various minor industries which will be carefully checked up by experts in each particular line and made available to capitalists or co-operative societies wishing to set up industries in various parts of the country.

It should scarcely be necessary for a Swadeshi propagandist body in 1933 to explain to educated Indians the paramount duty of practising Swadeshi, but unfortunately it is still very necessary to carry on propaganda among this class. It is this need which has brought the Sangha into being and the members of the Sangha are bound to go on working, successfully or unsuccessfully, until this need no longer exists. With full belief in the ultimate success of our efforts which in turn should mean the successful achievement of economic self-sufficiency for the country, we appeal to those interested persons who have not joined hands with us to do so. We feel that in India today all that is required is a lead on some organised lines and when this lead is once given thousands of workers will come forward to do their best and to sacrifice their time and money in order to achieve the common end of every thinking Indian. Any one who reads this press note and is interested or even curious is requested to communicate with the Joint Secretaries.

THE BREAKDOWN OF CAPITALISM.

The necessity for defending the right of free thinking and free speech in the midst of a changing world order was emphasised by Sir Michael Sadler at a meeting at Rhodes House, Oxford, in connexion with relief for refugees from German Universities.

Sir Michael said a considerable part of his thinking during the last nine months had led him decisively towards the left. The present economic system was proving itself daily less able to grapple with the whole problem of applying abundance to relief and the well-being of all humanity, and was beginning to wear upon its face signs of decay.

In those who represented most fully the present economic system he recognized and profoundly respected a steadiness of judgment and a real desire to help other people and a certain mellowness of judgment. On the other hand he could not believe that the economic system, as we now saw it, would alone be the economic system of the future. "I believe although the economic system, under which we live, will continue to exist, it will become more and more reduced in importance and side by side with it will be something that will consist in the communal distribution of things needed and in return for which the community will require labour and service.

"When one considered some of the cruel things that were happening in dark corners of Europe today, one began to wonder whether there was not some strange new influenza of mind abroad in Europe. Were we sure that it was not infectious and that it was not breeding something which even we in England might at some time catch. We had never been so free to speak our own minds as we now were in this country, yet it should not be forgotten that this tradition of freedom extended backwards for at most a century and a half. Was it certain that the earlier condition of things would not recur?"

WOMEN'S CONFERENCE IN TRAVANCORE.

(FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT.)

The Travancore constituency of the All India Women's Conference held its annual session last evening at the Victoria Jubilee Town Hall.

The attendance was large and influential, as Muslim purdha women also were present.

In welcoming the audience Mrs. Velayudhan Tampi, expressed her great regret at the unavoidable absence of Miss (Dr.) E. K. Janaki Ammal, who had promised to take the chair. She surveyed the educational problems which would be placed before them for their consideration. The large gathering of ladies present in the hall was ample proof of the great interest the women of Travancore were evincing in the very important and serious subject of women's education in the State. It gave further evidence of the fact that their sisters can join together and rise equal to the occasion when necessary.

It was announced that Miss. Janaki Ammal, could not be present as it was thought that women officers should not participate in the discussion concerning the recommendations of the Statham Committee. Miss D. H. Watts, retired Principal, Women's First Grade College, was proposed to the chair. But she also regretted her inability to comply with their request. Mrs. V. Sri Velayudhan, Tampi, was proposed to the chair, which she accepted.

Mrs. G. Raman Pillai, moved a resolution expressing the regret of the conference that the women of the land were not consulted by the Committee in shaping their proposal on women's Education in Travancore. Travancore has the proud boast of highest literacy in India of female education. They have several women's organisations including the Travancore constituency of the All India Women's Association. The evidence of women was taken by such Government bodies as the Public Service Commission, the Temple Entry Committee and the Co-operative Committee. Yet they were not consulted on the vital subject of women's education in the State. The resolution was unanimously passed.

Lady Rajagopalachari (wife of the late Sir. P. Rajagopalachari) moved a resolution protesting against the abolition of degree classes in the Women's College. She said:—

"The problems that confront us today are of vital importance and unless and until we wake up from our agelong slumber, muster our forces and mould our destinies along proper channels, we shall fall a prey to the visionary ideals of men, who are anxious to introduce drastic changes in the present system of the education in this State. In my view the authors of the Education Reform Committee have deplorably neglected the study of our social and economic conditions and have tried to introduce ideals and institutions which, however suitable in Western countries, is not conducive to the spread and progress of the education of our women. Women's education is still in its infancy in Travancore and many of the recommendations of the Statham Committee are calculated to retard the progress hitherto achieved. I deplore the view taken by the Committee that the first Grade Women's College is unnecessary in Trivandrum. A first Grade College for Women was a long-felt want in Travancore and I believe that, during the short period of its existence, it has sufficiently justified its existence. To-day there is a craze for novelty and however much people may talk of the advantages of co-education, I believe that every one will admit that the girls who take refuge in men's Colleges will find that their freedom is considerably curtailed and that they are deprived of the pleasures and blessings of real collegiate life. I believe strongly that this recommendation of the Committee is fraught with great danger to the spread of higher education and real culture among women. In the cause of the spread of higher education among our women and in order to give them full facilities in athletics and extra-class activities and to develop their corporate life, I implore you to accept the resolution and to raise your unanimous voice of protest against the recommendation of the Statham Committee to convert a First Grade Women's College."

It was duly seconded and supported and passed unanimously.

There was a long and heated discussion on married women and their entertainment in the Education Department, on the motion of Mrs. Anna Chandy, High Court Vakil and M. L. C. The Committee has recommended the non-entertainment in the higher grades of the Service of women who are married, especially in the Administrative branch. There is also a rider that those with a service of 10 years and under should be sent away. The speaker strongly condemned the proposal and could not understand the rationale of employing married women in the Primary Schools and preventing their employment in the higher grades. The reason urged, that vis., that such a source of action would prevent unemployment was un-understandable. On the contrary, it would increase unemployment. Further, the social and economic conditions of the country were quite different from the west where marriage was not so much insisted on as in India. If unmarried women alone were employed, it would lead to so many undesirable results in several directions which ought to be prevented in the Educational Department. At present married women were in so many departments, especially in the Medical and Educational Departments and their work has not been in any way less efficient than that of unmarried women or even other men. No change of a revolutionary character should be made until there was absolute need for it.

Mrs. G. Sankara Pillai speaking in Malayalam observed that, if the proposal of the Committee is sanctioned, unemployment among women would largely increase. At present there are in Travancore 177 women employed out of 1000 as against 383 in Baroda and 888 in Mysore. Women in Travancore are mostly employed in the Medical and Education Departments. Out of 4,000 women employees in the State Service 3,270 are in the Education Department. Taking married women, in Travancore, girls about 15 years old are mostly married, the actual figures being 900 out of every 1000 as against 44 for the whole of India. The proposed ban on married women, if carried out, would check the expansion of general culture and education among women and would ultimately result in the substantial shrinkage of educated women in the land.

Srinath Narayani, Anna M. L. A., moved a resolution to prevent professional begging in the towns and appealed to Government to put a stop to it and requested the Corporation of the public in cradating the evil by proper legislation and provision of suitable poor houses. This was duly seconded and supported and passed unanimously.

Mrs. A. G. Mathew moved a resolution which was adopted about the highly insanitary condition of certain roads and lanes and said that public latrines in sufficient number should be constructed to enforce the strict observance of the rules and regulations and thus prevent misuse of public places.

Mrs. Tharum moved the resolution urging the need of educating the masses by adopting a scheme of adult education which received the hearty support of the conference.

The last resolution was to object to the proposal to restrict admissions in Schools and Colleges by various means and to raise the expenses of education by the increase of fees. This was proposed by Miss Rajam and duly seconded and supported and passed.

MILLOWNERS AND THE TEXTILE INDUSTRY.

Representatives of the textile industry and businessmen prominent in the city's commercial and industrial life were present at the dinner given by the Bombay Millowners' Association at the Willingdon Sports Club, Bombay, on Monday, in honour of the Governor of Bombay.

The Governor in addressing the gathering, said:

"During the past five years I have had many opportunities of seeing you both individually and in your representative capacity, and it is with real regret that I reflect that this will probably be the last occasion on which I shall meet you before I leave India. We have had many important problems to discuss, and, while it is true that latterly those discussions have been conducted in the more rarefied atmosphere of the hills, yet the results of them must be reflected in the future of this city.

"I have often thought that a millowner and Tantalus have much in common. Always you seem to be reaching for a reward that eludes your grasp. Always just one little thing appears necessary to secure prosperity, and yet, when you have obtained it, it is found that something else has intervened and your striving has been in vain.

"A year or so ago tariffs were regarded as a cure for all your ills. You have your tariffs, but I do not hear any cries of gratitude from a happy and opulent industry! Five years ago we were assured that a substantial reduction in labour costs would set the industry firmly on its feet. To-day the earnings of labour have been reduced, yet dividends are few and far between.

"It would not, however, be fair to liken your industry to Mr. Micawber, who was always waiting for something to turn up. You do not follow that gentleman's example of placid contentment. You are always working and striving to bring about the rehabilitation of your industry. In fact, you seem to have something in common with Sisyphus and to share with him that exasperated sense of frustration he must have felt every time the stone started to roll down hill again.

"I am aware that Government also has been accused of adopting a Micawber-like attitude in financial matters, but you will be glad to hear that we have been able to illustrate that gentleman's profound economic theory—evolved, it is true, after unfortunate experience—and to balance our budget!

"The textile industry in this city has many peculiarities and to those of us who are unacquainted with its intricacies there are many puzzles. Why is it, for instance, that a tax of a rupee a bale on cotton, so we are told, should be a more serious matter for the industry than fluctuations of Rs. 50/- a bale in the cotton market, or that a tax of 75 per cent imposed on the products of your competitors is negligible compared with a tax of 2½ per cent on machinery and stores? But I must deal only very generally with the profound and peculiar conditions inherent in the industry you represent, and will not attempt to suggest any ready-made or doctrinaire solution of your problems.

"As you know, I and my Government have always done our best to promote your interests and to support your suggestions; but I am not sure that there is not perhaps a tendency to rely too much on tariffs and not enough on self-help. Seven years ago the Noyce Committee pointed out defects in organisation and management, all of which have not yet been put right. Then the Fawcett Committee and the Whitley Commission made recommendations in other directions—recommendations which, to some extent, depended upon prosperity—but some of which involve no expenditure and yet they have not been adopted.

"I would only say in this connection that we cannot rely for ever on protection, and we cannot expect the consumer to continue paying higher prices than those which would obtain in an open market. The consumer, too, is not unlikely to view with some concern cuts in wages and any forcing down of the standard of life of the worker.

"There is another class of community whose interests we must never forget and who deserve great consideration. I refer to the cotton grower, whom the economic depression has hit particularly badly. The price of Broach cotton last year, as we know, was barely 75 percent. of the pre-war price, and whereas during the pre-war period Indian cotton growers exported cotton worth 33 crores—a figure which rose to 65 crores during the post-war period—in 1931-32 they realised only 23 crores, and in 1932-33 only 20 crores.

"Obviously this contraction in the purchasing power of the grower must react to some extent on your industry. Moreover, attempts to help you at one time threatened to prejudice the exporter of cotton. Any contraction in foreign demand is bound to react further on prices and to make the lot of the grower still more difficult.

"I may appear to have struck a somewhat gloomy note, and yet I do not feel that we need be downhearted. You have traditions, you have a government that does not turn a deaf ear to your demands, you have a labour force, which is not less efficient than that of your competitors in this country. But there is no doubt that you will have to be ruthless in the excision of all that is unhealthy and clogging in the life of the industry you represent. If you do this I am sure the Bombay mill industry, which has admittedly fallen upon evil days, will once more improve. The discussions and agreements that you have entered into with producers in other countries can do nothing but good, and I congratulate you on the results already achieved.

"There is, however, one result of the present condition of the industry which personally fills me with regret, and that is that circumstances have prevented an expansion of welfare work which I am sure your Association would actively promote, if the necessary funds were available. There is much to be done, as will be obvious when it is realised that there are a few mills that have no dispensary and quite a number which still do not provide creches for their women workers.

"May I also say a word on village improvement. We all know how close is the association between industrial and agricultural workers. The great army of industrial workers is, I feel, a potential propagandist force for the cause of village improvement, because the ideals of welfare in its widest sense can be more easily inculcated in industrial centres, where large numbers of workpeople live in a small area and are more susceptible to influence in the mass.

"The industrialists of this Presidency, therefore, can exert a definite influence towards improving the lot of those working on the countryside and be a powerful factor in the cause of village betterment by creating amongst their workers a desire for cleanliness and hygiene—a gospel that these workers would preach when they return to their villages."

SANATANISTS AND TEMPLE ENTRY.

The Wardha correspondent of the Free Press Journal writes to that paper under date November 11—

Mahatmaji with his party arrived here at 7 a. m. from Nagpur. He was received by Seth Jannalal Bajaj and Mrs. Bajaj at the railway station. Arrangements for his morning ablutions and breakfast were made at the railway station by Mr. Bajaj.

Mahatmaji was ready within forty minutes to start.

At about 7-45 a.m. along with Mr. Jannalal Bajaj, Mahatmaji went to a village named Deoli which is about ten miles from Wardha and returned from it at 11-5 a.m.

An interesting incident took place at today's public meeting held at Deoli village. There is a temple established in the memory of a Vaishnav Mussalman saint who was a carder by profession. The trustees of the temple had decided by a majority that if the surrounding savarna Hindus by a majority desired the opening of the temple to Harijans they would gladly allow it.

The vote of the savarna Hindu public, representing some 25 villages, as ascertained at the meeting was unanimously in favour of opening the temple, hardly two or three persons dissenting. But when Mahatmaji reached the meeting place he found a group of Sanatanists who had come from the north ready to oppose the entry of Harijans by lying prostrate in front of the temple. They continued to disturb the meeting by shouting their slogans.

The police who were present at the meeting arrested them. A shastri from the Deccan who was present asked to be allowed to address the meeting. On being allowed, he said, the trustees were not unanimous and the temple entry question which was admitted by Mahatmaji to be a purely religious question could only be decided in accordance with the tenets of religion. Mahatmaji inquired the people present, who were 8000 in number, (apart from Harijans) as to what they had to say. A forest of hands was raised in favour of opening the temple to Harijans. There were nearly a hundred votes against opening the temple.

Mahatmaji asked if the trustees were present at the meeting. Getting the answer "Yes" he asked the trustees to signify their opinion. It was revealed that two of the trustees absented themselves from the meeting of the trustees. One of the trustees who was present did not vote and the remaining three who were acting under the inspiration of the Deccan Shastri and his friends decided to give their opinion against the opening.

In the circumstances Mahatmaji said he would not take the responsibility of declaring the temple open.

to the Harijans though technically the majority of the trustees had the right to give effect to their opinion. He said he would not shoulder the responsibility given to him. He advised the majority to confer with the minority and try to secure an agreement, and understand their objection.

Mahatmaji continuing said, that he had no desire to unnecessarily divide Hindu opinion. He considered the attitude of those who came to prostrate themselves in front of the temple as unreasonable and unseemly. But if they persisted, he said he would advise the reformers not to seek police assistance nor force entry. Worshipers would lose nothing by forbearance. Prostration could not go on eternally. He hoped that both the reformers and the sanatanists would act in a religious spirit tolerating each other's views.

Concluding Mahatmaji declared that he could have no desire to have anybody arrested. He hoped that those who were arrested would be released and that the temple would be opened to Harijans without delay peacefully.

THE POSITION OF JEWS IN GERMANY (BY MILDRED S. WERTHEIMER)

According to the last German census for which figures are available, June 16, 1925, the total population of the Reich was 62,410,619, of which 564,379 were Jews, who thus comprised 9/10ths of one per cent. The anti-Jewish measures of the Nazis, however, affect not only those listed as Jews, but also a newly created class of "non-Aryans". Although no official figures are available it is estimated that this "non-Aryan" category comprises approximately two million Germans, making a total of 2½ million persons in the Reich who, according to Nazi standards, are classified as Jews. In analyzing the role of the Jews both under the Empire and the Republic, the available data concerns only those officially listed as Jews.

In Imperial Germany almost no Jews held posts as officials in the civil service, the army or the navy. As a result of their position, the largest number of Jews turned to commerce, industry and banking. Those Jews desirous of entering professional life became for the most part doctors or lawyers, the two branches most readily open to them, which accounts in part for the relatively greater percentage of Jews in the liberal professions. During the war 96,327 Jews, or 17½ per cent of the Jewish population, served in the German army and navy. The percentage of Germans with the colours was slightly higher, 18½ per cent, but the fact that the Jewish birth-rate had been falling steadily for some time was apparently responsible for the existence of fewer Jewish than non-Jewish males of military age. Of the 96,000 enlisted Jewish soldiers and sailors, approximately 12,000 were killed, 78 per cent were at the front, and 12 per cent of those with the colours were volunteers. These figures are particularly important in view of the Nazi contention that most of the Jews who fought in the war held soft posts behind the lines.

The establishment of the Weimar Republic undoubtedly improved the status of the Jews. The largest proportion still found its way into commerce and industry, although many more than formerly entered the public administration. There are no reliable figures available for the occupational distribution of the Jews in the entire Reich. For Prussia, however—a state comprising three-fourths of Germany—statistics compiled from official sources give a full picture of the situation. Of the Jews in Germany in 1925, 71½ per cent lived in Prussia, where they formed 1½ per cent of the population as compared with the 9-10th of one per cent in the Reich as a whole.

The percentage of Jews in commerce and in the liberal profession is higher than their relation to the total population. They comprise, however, only 8¼ per cent of all persons engaged in commerce and business in Prussia, and 2½ per cent of the professional classes. The Jews in public administration and government, on which the Nazis have laid so much emphasis, comprise only 32 of one per cent of all officials in Prussia.

In their anti-Semitic agitation the Nazis have continually stressed the fact that great numbers of Eastern Jews (Ostjuden) have entered Germany during and since the war and, in a period of severe economic crisis, have secured good jobs which should have gone to deserving Germans. Whether or not this Nazi charge can be substantiated, undoubtedly a large number of Jewish emigrants came into the Reich after the war, many, if not most of them coming from territory which had formerly been German. Thus between 1910 and 1925 the number of Jews in Prussia increased by 37,093 despite the war, the economic difficulties and a continually falling Jewish birth-rate. There were, in 1925, 601,779 non-citizens in Prussia; of this number 76,387 were Jewish. According to figures prepared by the Nazis, 12,5000 Eastern Jews became citizens in Prussia between 1919 and 1931.

Despite the relatively small percentage of Jews in the Reich, Hitler has told his followers for ten years and more that the Jews are responsible for all German difficulties, and promised that once in power he would eliminate "Jewish influence" from all phases of German life. The most important measure concerning the Jews which has been enacted by the Hitler government is the law for the "restoration of the professional civil service," for this has been the model on which all subsequent anti-Semitic action has been based. The Civil Service Law was promulgated on April 7, 1933 and went into force on the following day. Since then the Ministers of Finance and the Interior have issued several decrees designed to carry out the law and defining its provisions exactly. Even when they conflict with previously existing laws, the law and the supplementary decrees are stated to apply to all officials of the Reich, the states and the municipalities, including not only the regular civil servants but also employees in semi-public enterprises and undertakings in which the government has a 50 per cent or larger financial interest. It applies as well to employees in the social services having the rights and duties of officials, while the Reich Bank and the German Railway Company are empowered to enforce its provisions. Furthermore, the following persons are included in the German civil service: judges; all courts officials; notaries; teachers in schools, including teachers and instructors in scientific universities (Hochschulen); all professors; officials of the old and new army (Wehrmacht); members of the police forces of the states, not including officers, army doctors or veterinarians; elected municipal officials; and office employees and workers in public enterprises.

The Civil Service Law provides that "officials who are of non-Aryan descent must be retired; in so far as concerns honorary officials, the latter must be dismissed from their positions." A "non-Aryan" is then defined as "a person descended from non-Aryan, particularly Jewish, parents or grandparents. It suffices if one parent or grandparent is a non-Aryan. This applies especially if one parent or grandparent has professed the Jewish religion."

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

Besides stipulating immediate dismissal of "non-Aryan" officials, the Civil Service Law contains other far-reaching provisions.

In order to comprehend the radical changes effected by the new civil Service Law, it is necessary to recall that in Germany under both the Empire and the Republic officials held a specially favoured position and the public administration always enjoyed an enviable reputation for integrity, efficiency and stability. Before the war, in practice if not in law, higher officials were recruited from the upper classes of society and few Jews were admitted. Under the democratic Republic, however, the Weimar Constitution laid down the principle that "citizens without discrimination shall be eligible for public office in accordance with the laws and their capacities and merits." It stated that "officials shall be appointed for life except as otherwise provided by law," and specified the rights and protective measures applying to them. The Weimar instrument declared that "officials are servants of the whole community and not of a party," and granted them "freedom of political opinion and freedom of association."

At the time of the general boycott Jewish judges and lawyers were excluded from the courts although the procedure adopted varied in different sections of the Reich. The situation in regard to the medical profession is similar to that of the legal profession, since the Jews have been especially prominent in both fields.

The measures enacted by the Nazis against "non-Aryan" lawyers and doctors have had far-reaching effects on the status of law and medicine in the Reich, but the real foundations of the Third Reich are being laid in the realm of education. Not only will the rising generation be taught by "pure" Aryans, but there will be no possibility for German youth to become tainted by exposure to the hated doctrines of liberalism and democracy. Instruction will be given in racial questions. Great emphasis is to be laid on the glorious history of Germany and the "shame" of the years 1919 to 1932; "Wehr sport," i. e., military sports, are to have a prominent place in the curriculum for both students and teachers; and youth is to be imbued with real fighting spirit and extreme nationalism as the primary object of education. Fact-finding, painstaking research is no more; the Nazis, it is reported by competent authorities, "must think with their blood."

A further indication of this "safeguarding" of the German spirit is to be found in the law ousting all Jewish actors, directors, producers, cameramen, authors and conductors from the German film industry and the German theatre. Most "non-Aryans" have been expelled from orchestras, both as conductors and as musicians, and in principle no "non-Aryan" soloists may appear in concerts or on the radio; so-called Jewish influence has thus been removed from music, literature and art. In the field of journalism, many eminent writers have been dismissed because of their race, and confiscation of the entire Socialist and Communist press has thrown large numbers out of work. Furthermore, during the process of "co-ordinating" the non-Nazi press, numerous "non-Aryans" have been ousted.

Nazi opposition to Jewish "intelligence" is apparent in these measures which not only make it practically impossible for Jews in the liberal professions to earn a living, but also limit the possibilities, especially in higher education, for "non-Aryan" youth to acquire training and knowledge. The fear and hatred of the Hitlerites for so-called Jewish business acumen is undoubtedly just as great, as indicated by their constant references to "Jewish materialism."

The thoroughness with which the Nazis have acted in economic life is perhaps not quite so marked as in the professions where definite laws have been promulgated regulating Jewish participation. While the measures taken in regard to business have been far-reaching, there are some indications that concern over the grave economic situation may for the present have tempered Nazi ardour to "cleanse" business.

On October 2 the Hitler Government promulgated the Hereditary Homestead Law creating a "peasant aristocracy," which is to consist of "Germans, Aryan and honourable." Under this law, "Aryans" are those whose families have been free of Jewish blood since 1800. While very few Jews in the Reich are engaged in agriculture, this is nevertheless a significant move.

The problem of citizenship for German Jews has already received the attention of the Hitler government, which has thus acted in accordance with the official programme of the National Socialist party. On July 14, 1933, the Reich Cabinet decided to withdraw German citizenship at its discretion from "undesirables" naturalized within the last fifteen years—between November 9, 1918 and January 30, 1933.

THE REFORMER AND CHRISTIAN MISSIONS.

"There are few Indian journals we read with more pleasure, profit and approval than The Indian Social Reformer. On one subject, however, we are quite sure our able Bombay contemporary does less than its usual justice. We write in no spirit of controversy when we draw attention to the Reformer's statement on Nov. 11 that 'Christian Missions are primarily proselytising agencies' and 'Missions exist to proselytise.' Since we are quite certain the serious misunderstanding arises from either ambiguity of terms or from absence of definition, we will say that the clearest definition of this much-discussed term we have seen is given by the Rev. P. N. F. Young, M. A., Chaplain of Simla, in the current Young Men of India thus: 'To try to win converts by depreciating the faith of others, by any kind of pressure, or any kind of bribery, however subtle; anything, in a word, that does violence to the personality of others.' To avoid this is the ideal of Christian Missions, though individuals may occasionally fail in achieving the ideal. If our noble contemporary will accept this assurance once for all, not only does it make the rest of the paragraph on Nov. 11 unnecessary, but it will help the Reformer to understand better many of its most earnest readers, to co-operate with whom we are sure has been one of the Reformer's most treasured aims through its 44 years of remarkable service. Christian Missions are in India for the purpose of presenting to India Jesus Christ as Example and Saviour and of sharing with India their own experience of His peace and power. Sir James Young Simpson, the great scientist, the discoverer of chloroform, was once, his daughter tells us, being interviewed. "And what," asked the interviewer pencil in hand, 'what do you consider the greatest discovery you ever made?' 'That I have a Saviour,' was Sir James Simpson's answer. Missionaries have made that discovery and they have come to India to announce it to others.

"Closely connected with this misunderstanding about the missionary aim is a similar misunderstanding about the missionary dynamic and method, and following on this comes a misunderstanding about the attitude many missionaries have regretfully been compelled to adopt towards the Hocking Commission Report. In an unsigned article on November 4 the Reformer stated: 'The modern leaders of

India have noticed with great amazement the hostile attitude taken by certain American Christian denominations towards that epoch-making Report of the Hocking Commission in regard to the need of change in the principles and methods of Christian propaganda. One possible reply out of many is that the Hocking Report met with a far more 'hostile attitude' in Britain than in America, and still more so from that great oriental Christian leader, Kagawa of Japan. Why?

INDIA'S KEY POSITION.*

Rev. F. W. Norwood, Pastor, City Temple, London, who is now in Madras, addressed a weekly meeting of the Madras Rotary Club on "India's key position."

Dr. Norwood began by saying that, in his early years, he remembered having read in a book on the life of Napoleon, that India held a key position in the world and that every nation that had possessed it had possessed it at the apex of its strength, and after these long years he was of opinion that it was a prophetic statement. The lure of India had been great in the past and history revealed that it was this lure that led to the discovery of the major portion of the world. It was this lure that had led the Portuguese, the Spaniards, the French and the British to undertake risky ventures and in a century the whole world belonged to the nations of Europe.

But the times were changing now and it seemed to Dr. Norwood that Europe had come to a halt. Europe had no longer that economic power, and that mechanical power which had made her great in the past. Those powers were now shared by all other countries. A little country, Japan, was flaunting the Western nations. Tremendous changes were also being made in China and one could not guess where it would end. India was situated midway between the East and the West and her future position was very important. For the sake of world peace, it was imperative for the contending nations in the East and in the West to come to a mutual understanding and to drop into the background their ambitions, so that the great treasures of the East might be poured into a common receptacle and so that, together, they might find greater wealth, greater happiness, greater unity and greater splendour than they had found hitherto.

In reply to a question, Dr. Norwood said India was also changing and excessive nationalism was one of the manifestations of that change. But that was not the only manifestation of that change.

A JAPANESE VIEW OF INDIA.

That a Japanese Trade Mission should now visit India is the opinion expressed in an interview granted to the Associated Press by Mr. Kadono, who leaves for Calcutta en route to Japan. Mr. Kadono was the adviser to the Japanese Delegation at the World Economic Conference and was asked to proceed to India to assist the Japanese Delegations in their negotiations with the Indian Government. He said: "I am glad to have had the chance of coming to India and doing a bit to promote better understanding between two countries. I have had an opportunity of meeting all people, both official and unofficial, and have received uniform courtesy and charming hospitality. I am happy to hear from all sides reports regarding the impression made by Mr. Sawada and Mr. Kurata on all with whom they have come in contact. We were happy to have been represented by such eminent leaders in these negotiations."

*From the Hindu.

"As regards the outcome of these talks, I have every confidence that satisfactory arrangements will be made. Life consists of compromise as much in the personal and the national sphere as in the international. Although the agreement is not yet complete in all details, everything conducive towards it has been done and I am leaving with the hope that we have seen the end of our labours."

Mr. Kadono remarked that this visit had been a great education to him. He said, "I confess my ignorance about India and in fact I am very surprised with what I have seen in these five or six weeks. I see a great deal of trade possibilities between the two countries and I hope my countrymen will also come and see it. It will be very good if Japanese businessmen formed a trade mission and came here. I confess I did not realise how huge a country India was. I knew you had 850 million people but I thought the country was over-crowded. When I go into figures it is only half of ours in relation to population per area. I also thought the country was terribly hot all the year round. I find it is not."

"As regards the Indians whom I have met, I am amazed. They speak English so beautifully that I think Indians make better linguists than we Japanese. Judging by those with whom I have come into contact, Indians have great talents and capacity and if they show more enterprise they should be able to improve the economic resources of their country and raise their standard of living." Mr. Kadono visited Indian bazars and saw their method of business.

He said: "I find that Japanese textiles fill a good space in your shops but as regards other materials I am surprised to find the extent to which Czechoslovakian goods find a market in India. Considering the hold this European country has on the Indian market, I think it is hard on poor Japan to be made to suffer." The system in Indian bazars is different from that in Japan. I suppose the climate has a lot to do with it." Mr. Kadono finally referred to the result of the present visit. He said: "Over forty of us who have come this time will go back having understood India better."

WAR AND TERRORISM.

Speaking at the Armistice Day Dinner at the Grand Hotel, Calcutta, His Excellency Sir John Anderson, Governor of Bengal, said:

"The evidence that you have given me of your continued confidence and support cannot fail to be a source of encouragement and strength to the Head of a Government engaged in a struggle which though it could not possibly be dignified by the name of war has something of the character of an armed conflict. I have sometimes amused myself in the leisure moments which a Governor enjoys by comparing the sort of fight which my Government is carrying on against terrorism with war as we knew it. It seems to me that there are points of resemblance as well as of difference. In real war you know for certain who are your friends and who your enemies. In this conflict it is some times difficult to draw the distinction. That is a point of difference. In both, non-combatants sometimes get in the way and can be a source of embarrassment to those whom they would reckon as their friends. But there is this that can be said and I say it with confidence if we bring to this local conflict of ours the qualities that carried you to victory in the great war the firmness, the resolution, the calm and balanced judgment, a refusal to be deflected from one set course by panop counsels, to be either unduly cast down by temporary reverses or to be unduly elated by successes, the issue cannot possibly be in doubt. Such a conflict, like any war great or small, is ultimately a test of quality."

AFGHANISTAN TO-DAY.

Afghanistan to-day represents a united country where, in every direction, one sees signs of a new awakening, and where all those in power are engaged in drawing up a carefully thought-out programme of work that has to be accomplished before the next stage of reforms is reached, state Sir Syed Maswood, Syed Sulaiman Nadvi and Sir M. Iqbal, in the course of a statement issued on their return from Afghanistan whither they had proceeded to advise the Afghan authorities on the proposed Afghan University.

They add: "We have come back from Afghanistan convinced of the fact that if those at present in power are given an opportunity of working in peace for another ten years, the future prosperity of the country will have been assured." The signatories further say that there is complete safety of life and property in the country, and that they were impressed by the very earnest manner in which all the Ministers were discharging their duties.

Sir Mohamed Iqbal, in the course of an interview, observed that the Afghan Government was determined to maintain law and order and friendly relations with the neighbouring countries.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Purdah and the Cloister.—Our quotation from the Bengalee of the phrase "Purdah Nuns" was evidently an error of judgment. The Indian Social Reformer has taken the phrase literally, and writes: "We do not think that this importation of purdah women from the West will seriously interfere with the movement of women's emancipation in India. But it will be certainly welcomed by opponents of the reform, as showing that purdah has the sanction of Christianity." This only shows how careful one has to be in adopting Noncatholic terms for Catholic things. It is only a few religious orders that keep strict enclosure; women who enter these orders do so quite voluntarily; and there is no physical compulsion to keep them within their enclosure. This shows how entirely different is the "Purdah" which has the sanction of the Catholic Church from the universal social custom that Indian reformers rightly criticise. There is no comparison between a very exceptional and always voluntary religious vocation and a general custom imposed indiscriminately on all womenfolk.—The Examiner.

Calcutta Hostel for Deserted Girls.—A training hostel for girls above a certain age, who are often found deserted in a big city like Calcutta, has been a long-felt want, although the problem has not been tackled with the diligence and care that it deserves. It has therefore been considered essential to establish a hostel, which will provide the necessary training to a girl to earn her living. The rigours of caste and creed also stand in the way of an enterprise of this sort. It is understood that the All-Bengal Women's Union, of which Her Highness Maharani Sucharu Devi of Mayurbhanj is the president, has taken up the matter in all earnestness and has been collecting funds to found such an institution for Indian girls of over 16 years of age without any restrictions of caste or creed. A sum of over Rs. 8,000 has been collected for the purpose. Plans for the home have almost been completed and it is hoped that the hostel will be opened by the middle of this month in one of the old military barracks at Dum-Dum. The training will include weaving, basket-making, plain needle-work, embroidery, sweets and cake making, carpet making and fine laundry work.

NOTES

An Academic War:—A foretaste of what we might expect from the proposed partitioning of British India into eleven statutory provinces, is furnished by the unedifying quarrel between the Madras and Bombay Universities over the admission of students in their respective colleges. It would seem that an undergraduate from Bombay was refused admission in the Mangalore College affiliated to the Madras University. The University insisted on testing the student's qualification independently of his status gained in the Bombay University. He seem to have complained to the Bombay University, which thereupon protested to the Madras University. The latter seems to have maintained that it had the right to decide for itself, whether a student, who sought admission to any College affiliated to it was qualified to follow the instruction imparted in it, and that the Bombay University could not interfere with its discretion. The Bombay University resented this as a violation of the principle of reciprocity, and passed a resolution debaring students from Madras from being admitted to any of the Bombay Colleges. The Bombay University, however, has declared what really is a boycott of Madras students. At the same time, it is certainly a hardship that several Madras men who came to Poona or Bombay expecting to be admitted to the institutions here, should be suddenly told that owing to the difference between the Madras and Bombay Universities, they were not eligible to study in institutions in Bombay. This controversy, recalling the Jenkins' Ear War, is what one may expect to see repeated in many directions, and on a larger scale, when the Indian Provinces undergo the operation contemplated of in the new Reforms.

Balkanising India:—Sir Henry Lawrence, a member of the Indian Civil Service, India who rose to be an Acting Governor of Bombay, has issued a statement which we reprint today, against what he calls the 'balkanisation of India' involved in the White Paper scheme of splitting up British India into eleven provinces. "Europe," he writes, "is busy attempting to wipe out the barriers to prosperity caused by the uprising of so many petty states and their interjealousy. Are we not now in India repeating the same disastrous error in the creation of new small states, which can have no hope whatever of establishing stable and competent government?" This is a very pertinent question, which we have ourselves more than once asked. We cannot help thinking that the scheme of cutting up British India into eleven statutory provinces can have only one idea behind it, and that is "after me the deluge". Sir Henry Lawrence wants the provinces of India to be made larger, and not smaller. He says that a financial breakdown can be averted only by reducing the number of separate governments "with their inevitable tendency to profit by extravagance." We have no objection to this suggestion. Sir Henry Lawrence does not make it clear whether he wants British India to continue to be a unitary government as it is now. If he does, we think the scheme is not a bad one, though we should think that it is not necessary to undertake the re-distribution of provinces as a preliminary condition to constitutional reform. If he does not, our objections to the division proposed in the White Paper will equally apply to his proposal also.

Communal Problems:—We referred in a leading article in the Reformer of October 7 to Lord Reading's observations regarding the relations between the religious communities of India, in his article on "Constitutional Reform" in the American Quarterly, Foreign Affairs. In that article the ex-Viceroy spoke of "deep and fundamental antagonisms between the great communities of the country." We referred in reply to the statement of the Census Commissioner of India that, in several places in the Punjab, it is difficult to distinguish between Hindus and Muhammadans. The Punjab is a predominantly Muslim province. In other provinces where Muslims are minorities, the difficulty is still greater. Muslims speak the same language, the same vernacular as the Hindus, they dress in the same way, and follow the same or similar customs in their social life. The ex-Viceroy said in his article that "for generations and centuries these great communities have remained sharply separate from each other in many of the most vital things of life." Scores of instances can be given where, in vital matters, the Hindu and Mahomedan communities were and are closely associated. One of the most remarkable instances is in the sphere of music. In the tomb of Nizamuddin, near Delhi, Hindu and Musalman musicians hold a weekly musical concert in honour of the saint. Another instance is furnished by the annual Tansen festival in Gwalior, which was celebrated a few days ago, and a short report of which we publish in another column. At this festival, Hindu and Musalman musicians participated and as the report says, the festival began with a harikaika, which is a story from the Hindu Puranas told to the accompaniment of music, and ended with Muslim prayers. Fundamental religious differences are not incompatible with communities living together in peace and harmony, as has been the case in India. On the other hand, fundamental religious agreement between the Jews and Christians, and Jews and Musalmans, have not prevented them from occasional clashes as in Germany and in Palestine.

Prof. Einstein and War:—Prof. Einstein, it would seem, has revised his opinion of militarism and war, in view apparently of the anti-Jewish policy pursued in Germany. We print elsewhere an open letter to him published as a leader in World Tomorrow of New York. Referring to his unconditional opposition to War in 1929, World Tomorrow writes: "They were sane in 1929, they are sane in 1933. Their rationality thousands of war resisters, the world round, unshaken, will continue to attest. Without bitterness, though with profound sorrow, these men and women will cease to follow you. They will, on the contrary, equip themselves even more vigorously, unblinded against militarism and war: militarism, as international as disease; war as ubiquitous as death."

"At War":—We reprinted last week a passage from the speech made by Sir John Anderson, Governor of Bengal, at the Armistice Day Dinner at Calcutta. So far from claiming that his measures for the suppression of terrorism have been successful, His Excellency described his Government as engaged in a war, with the difference that, while in a war you knew who your enemies were, in the campaign against terrorism you did not. The Government of Bengal, because of this difference, has considered itself justified in treating Hindus as such in the affected areas as its enemies, actual or potential, and in imposing galling restrictions on their movements. The Secretary of State for India cited the Queen's Proclamation, which has been almost forgotten, in justification of according Dominion subjects a privileged position in India under the Reforms. There is a clause in that Proclamation which runs as follows: "We declare it to be our Royal will and pleasure that none be in any wise favoured, none molested or disquieted, by reason of their religious faith or observances." It is true that most of the anarchists are Hindus. But what proportion do they form of the total Hindu population? If many anarchists are Hindus does it follow that all Hindus are anarchists? How else can you justify measures subjecting all Hindus as such in the areas concerned to harassing restrictions? The Secretary of State evidently concurs with the Bengal Government in this logical perversion, for he told the House of Commons on the 13th inst. in reply to a question about the measures taken to cope with anarchic violence in Bengal, "that steps have been taken to control the movement of Hindu youths."

Tagore in Bombay:—Dr Rabindranath Tagore who arrived in Bombay on Thursday with some students from Shantiniketan with a view to giving dramatic performances, has issued an appeal in which he explains that he has undertaken the present visit with the purpose of raising funds for his international university, Viswa-Bharati. He writes:—"I have done all in my power and, therefore, have the right to claim help from my countrymen by way of relieving me from a burden that is daily growing painful for me to bear. Year after year I am called upon to meet large deficits from my nearly exhausted resources supplemented by casual donations collected at the risk of my health and of an utter neglect of my vocation as a literary man. We have even been driven to curtail the expenditure of our institution almost to the verge of mutilating some of its important features." Viswa-Bharati has attained world fame as a centre of Indian culture and we trust the Bombay public will respond generously to the appeal of the Poet.

American Recognition of Russia:—The recognition by the United States Government of the Soviet regime in Russia, is an event of much significance. Ten years ago Russia was untouchable, unspeakable, unapproachable to Europe and America. Every attempt was made by the latter to isolate and destroy the Soviet Government. Its complete collapse was confidently predicted and hourly expected. Every method of propaganda was employed to discredit Russian leaders. It is surely a proof at least of the tenacity of these men that in spite of all this they have won recognition at the hands of her worst distractors. Something like this has also happened in the case of the Fascists in Italy. It is sure to be the same with the Nazi regime in Germany. The great thing is to pay no attention to vilification, misrepresentation and abuse and to persevere in the course marked out by ourselves without allowing ourselves to be distracted an inch to the right or to the left. "Take your stand upon a great idea", said Emerson, "all the world will come to you." History amply attests the truth of this great saying.

CHRISTIANITY AND MISSIONS.

A valuable contribution to the subject of the future of Missions in India has been made by Dr. Clifford Manshardt, of the Nagpada Neighbourhood House, in his new book "Christianity In A Changing India."* Dr. Manshardt recognises that "Christianity has in time past been too much of a dividing force and too little of a co-operator." "We have worked upon the assumption that we alone carry the medicine to cure the world's ills, and we have refused to call in experts of the non-Christian religion for consultation. We have too often," he writes, "and we must confess it in humility, chosen the wrong way of making Christian converts. We have offered inducements to men to accept our religion, and we have violated individual personalities." He protests against the money handed out by some missionaries to outcaste converts, condemning it as another link in the chain of dependence. The church, too often in India, has been the creation of foreign enterprise and foreign capital. Dr. Manshardt, as one who is anxious to see that Indian Christians are Indian as well as Christian, places emphasis on the need for self-support and Indianisation of worship. Approaching the subject from the point of view of the advanced missionary thinker, Dr. Manshardt, on questions of architecture, music and worship, takes up an almost identical stand to that of the author of the "Chinese Appeal to Christendom" to which we have referred in these columns. Dr. Manshardt points out that the scope of mission work has been considerably extended. It now includes, for instance, rural reconstruction work. The book in the main is an effort to popularise the conclusions of the Hocking Report and in one point it makes the same mistake.

Dr. Manshardt, as an American mission worker in India, has found a method of working in this country in co-operation with men of other religions and he points out that this has chiefly been possible, because the co-operator places emphasis not upon winning men to his faith but upon helping them to live the good life. It is difficult, however, to understand his analysis of the American missionary's "unenviable position in India". "He was there", he writes, "as a guest of the British Government, and as a guest, he had certain obligations to his host. Each American missionary, before entering India, must sign a declaration of neutrality in regard to political affairs." The position, Dr. Manshardt points out, is further complicated by Government grants-in-aid received by several mission institutions on their educational side. It is, perhaps this which has caused the American missionary worker to regard himself as a guest of the British Government rather than of the Indian people. A strict observance of the principle of neutrality would imply total abstention from the political activities of the country in which the worker has launched his activities. Dr. Manshardt's interpretation of neutrality was, he tells us, evolved out of a discussion with an acting Governor of Bombay, who defined it as "being as fair to the Government as to the Nationalists". We do not see why a social and religious worker should feel called upon to express an opinion on any side. Politics, we should have said, lay very much outside his sphere of activities and the moment he feels inclined to enter into the political life of the country, his utility as a mission worker is bound to depreciate. We have no reason to expect, on the other hand, that all missionaries will as a group follow the same political ideals in India any more than they do in their own countries. But here the conditions now prevalent make it easier for workers to throw in their lot with the Government. The active help some of them render in the shape of propaganda in their own country has tended to make the group suspect among nationalists. It is conceivable, of course, that a missionary may feel called upon to condemn particular actions of both Government and the Nationalists. But this generally speaking is rare and we agree with Dr. Manshardt that too often the mission worker is overanxious to commit himself to one side or the other.

Father Basenach on Birth Control:—In his speech at the Madras Rotary Club, which is reprinted elsewhere, Rev. Father Basenach, Madras, has not repeated his argument at the Catholic meeting, some weeks back, that Abraham Lincoln and Benjamin Franklin would not have been born if their parents had practised birth-control. At the Madras Rotary Club, the Reverend Father took a broader line, and one which it is easier for ordinary people to follow. We are unable, however, to agree with him that birth-control should be discussed more as a religious and moral act than from the economic point of view. The real cause of the high birth rate in India is, as suggested by Dr. Hutton himself, the very low standard of life of the people. In Europe, as the Census Commissioner has shown, the rate has fallen progressively with the rise of the standard of life. The same thing, as he himself suggests, will happen in India. But instead of pleading for measures to raise the economic and educational condition of the people, the Census Commissioner has recommended the curtailment of the population by means of birth-control! This is very like fitting the head to the cap. The contention of "Mother" whose article on the same subject we reproduce from the Hitavada that the problems of too frequent pregnancies is an acute one amongst middle class families, is precisely what we pointed out in our leading article in the Reformer of the 11th November.

[Nov. 25]

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA—XL

The State of Illinois has three Universities. These are the University of Chicago, the North-Western University and the University of Illinois. Professor Bradon kindly took me to the North Western University which is about thirty miles distant from Chicago. He is the author of an interesting book recently published dealing with the latest developments in India and the Far East in a broad sympathetic spirit. The North Western University has a College of Journalism which is regarded as one of the best in the United States. When I was in America I read of a scheme to amalgamate this with the School of Journalism of Chicago University. We met a number of people much interested in India at Professor Bradon's home. The University has a large and well-equipped Library where for the first time I saw the bulk of the work of fetching and carrying books being done by machinery. A slip of paper with the names of the books required is inserted in a tube which carries it to the floor below or above where the books are kept. In a few minutes they are brought up and deposited on a counter by a grid moving on a revolving band. As I was standing, several volumes of the Indian Social Reformer were tumbled on the table by this means. The Library has all the important newspapers and magazines of India filed. I noticed among them the Hindu of Madras, the Leader of Allahabad, the Tribune of Lahore and the Liberty of Calcutta. The Modern Review has a prominent place among Indian periodicals. The Library has also the latest Indian books. In fact it seems to specialise in India. I have since suggested to students, Indian and American, that the Library of the North Western University is the best place where they can get up-to-date information on Indian affairs. There are a good few of them engaged in studies relating to India. I recall a girl graduate at Chicago calling on me for elucidation of several passages in articles in the Reformer ranging over many years. She was writing a thesis on India based principally, she told me, on materials furnished by the Reformer. Dr. Bradon in his book has also quoted freely from the Reformer. Many friends in America spoke in appreciation of the non-partisan attitude of the Reformer on all questions of the day and its wide range of interest. Dr. Fisher wrote that the Indian Social Reformer is having a profound influence in select circles in America.

I made a courtesy call on the Mayor of Chicago before leaving. I expected, in view of the shooting to death of his immediate predecessor, that the vast Municipal Buildings would be closely guarded by armed police. But I did not see a single armed man about the place. We were taken through a number of rooms into a large hall where a group of persons were sitting round a table chatting. I took them to be persons who like myself had come to see the Mayor and calculated how long I would have to wait till he would be able to receive me after disposing of these earlier callers. I had hardly waited for a couple of minutes, however, when one of the group came towards me. He was the Mayor. He was a gigantic man with an Irish name, Kelly, if I mistake not, and he made a short speech of welcome as he shook hands with me. After a few formal words I left. A messenger followed us and wanted to know to whom in India the Mayor should write acknowledging the courtesy of this visit. Das Gupta laughingly told him that the Mayor should write to the Viceroy of India as Gandhiji was in jail.

Marshall Field's is perhaps the largest Emporium of its kind in America. Its premises extend over many acres and its different sections are as large as streets, and are, I think numbered as such. Anything and everything can be had here from a toy worth a few cents to articles worth many thousands of dollars. The Superintendent who kindly accompanied us during one of our visits to this great emporium, told us that their payroll on the busy season ran up to fifteen thousand while in ordinary times they had 10,000 employees. We saw eight or nine women engaged in merely taking down the names and addresses of customers in order to keep in touch with them. There are innumerable elevators, ordinary and express, to take you to the different floors. But the escalator was a new thing which we saw here. It is a staircase which you have no need to climb as it revolves and puts you down where you want. One can spend several hours watching the people getting up and down the escalators—it is so like a picture.

Kedarnath Das Gupta is one of the outstanding figures in our recollections of Chicago. He has his headquarters in London and New York dividing his time between the two continents. He has been absent from India for sixteen years. When the news of Mr. Sen-Gupta's death reached America, Das Gupta said that he was the last friend he had in India and his death broke the only link he had with it. Das Gupta was with us every morning and on most evenings. He does not like to speak of past events but he gave me glimpses of his varied career and his contacts with many of the eminent men of India. He had amusing stories to tell of many of them but there was not a trace of censoriousness in any of them. He has centres all over Europe and the United States which have for their object the promotion of interest in and knowledge of Indian culture. American friends spoke with respect and even affection of him in Chicago as also in New York. He is a devotee, if I may say so, of Gandhiji and, as the outward sign of the inward grace, he wears a Gandhi cap. Since coming to India we sent him a consignment of these cheap and convenient head coverings which he wanted for his friends. Das Gupta was the moving spirit of the World Fellowship of Faiths. Amidst many difficulties and discouragements he persevered and, with the help of his colleague Mr. Charles F. Weller, carried it to success. His friendly services to us did not cease when we left Chicago. He made arrangements for our visit to Washington; and, during our second stay in New York, much of our programme was drawn up by him. We are deeply indebted to Kedarnath Das Gupta for his invaluable friendly offices to us during the latter half of our visit to America.

We were delighted to see our old friend, Dr. T. C. Khandwala, in Chicago. He was as active in his intellectual interests as ever and had made a wide circle of friends and acquaintances amongst University Professors and students, during his four years domicile in different parts of the country. He had visited several States and had acquired an intimate knowledge of the conditions of life in them. He had made himself independent of hotels and boarding houses by preparing every day his kichdi (with peas in default of dhal) which with milk, curds and fruit furnished him with all he needed by way of meals. He was looking healthier and happier than when I saw him last in Bombay.

Professor S. L. Joshi came up to Chicago for the Haskell Institute. He is, I believe, one of the few Indians who are full Professors in an American University. He is doing much directly and indirectly to diffuse interest in Indian culture in America. I found his suggestions very helpful though we did not agree in all matters. Professor Joshi urged Kamakoti to remain behind for six months assuring her that she could do a lot of work for India in the States.

Susette is a naturalised French girl who became Kamakoti's constant companion in Chicago. She went about with us in an Indian sari with the kunkum mark on her forehead. At first Kamakoti was rather doubtful as to how the transformation would be taken by the people around us. There was little need for it, however, for every one seemed quite pleased with the new costume. Some other girls wanted to be initiated in the mysteries of the sari. Susette learnt the art in a couple of days and she is in a position to carry on the sartorial propaganda among the young women of Chicago. She regularly attended the lectures. She told us one day that a lady who sat next to her was under the impression that my turban was meant to cover complete baldness. I wish it were true as it would save the trouble of having a hair-cut every two or three weeks.

Mr. Hamblin was a Missionary in a village near Kolhapur some years ago. He used to come to see me and we had long talks on Indian problems including that of Christian Missions in this country. One day he wrote to me that he had made up his mind to retire from the Mission. He said he would much like to come back to India but without Mission affiliations. He called on me at Chicago. His first remark was: "You were against Missions to your country but you have yourself come on a mission to my country." I replied I was not there to make proselytes! Mr. Hamblin told me he had a Church in Michigan and a congregation of liberal-minded people. We much regretted in the pressure of engagements we missed the pleasure of seeing the Hamblins in their home some fifty miles from Chicago.

One of the new acquaintances I made at Chicago was the Rev. Alvah Hugh Laurence, Pastor of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Brook, Indiana. He has devised a scheme which he calls "A Project in Character Training." He explained it to me and sent me a copy of a booklet or describing it. He thinks that the scheme can be adopted in all countries. I had a general notion that American Pastors outside the great cities were too self-centred to take any interest in the world outside. Mr. Laurence did much to remove this prejudice. He was a broad-minded man intent on helping all humanity by his scheme.

The Chinese are excluded from the States by the Emigration law. But they seem to play an indispensable part in American economy, chiefly as laundrymen. But for them New York and Chicago will go unwashed. There is a China Town in both cities and Chinese restaurants are much patronised by American. We went to one of these for our meals in Chicago. The room was full of guests. Hume asked for chopsticks but the Manager smilingly pleaded that they had none on the premises.

The weather was very hot in Chicago. Deaths from heat were reported from New York. We asked the Hotel for fans. They were very sorry but they had tried but could not find any in all Chicago!

I was talking to a well-informed American friend about Presidential elections in the United States. I asked him if it was possible for a poor man in this great Democracy to become President. He replied, it would be very difficult, adding, after a moment's thought, that there have been some cases of men who were not wealthy being elected to the office, for instance, President Wilson. "What happens in such cases?" I asked. He replied, "Their friends help them." I reminded him of the attacks made on Mr. Ramsay MacDonald during his first Premiership for having accepted the gift of a motor car from a wealthy friend. The American view, I added, seemed to be different in such matters. My friend laid his hand on my shoulder and said: "The only difference is that what we do openly here they do privately in the old country."

We were sorry we could not accept several invitations amongst them a very kind one to visit Harvard.

MY DEBT TO DR. R. A. HUME.

(BY WILBUR S. DEMING)

We are living in days of great perplexity and the Christian missionary is finding that his sphere of work is not separate from the general situation of uncertainty. The industrial depression has worked havoc with missionary finances. The giving up of fruitful projects is not an easy task for those who have given their lives to the building up of such projects. National introspection in the West has led, among other factors, to a gradual decrease in missionary interest. The rising tide of communalism in India, and, to some extent, of nationalism, offers new developments that claim attention and necessitate readjustments. At a time like this, it is helpful to recall to the mind certain fundamental attitudes that are just as essential today as they were a hundred years ago.

During the past two and a half years, it has been the writer's privilege to reside in the bungalow where Dr. R. A. Hume lived and worked for half a century. To follow in such a tradition and to attempt to carry out his ideals, as a community missionary, have not been easy. But to have a share in the fruitage of his work has been a constant inspiration and a continuing challenge. Dr. Hume was not only a great missionary; he was also a man with a great heart, and his influence is ever fresh in the minds of those who knew and loved him. I am glad to acknowledge my daily indebtedness to Dr. Hume, and I desire to share with readers of the Reformer some of his outstanding qualities that have meant so much to me.

One of Dr. Hume's greatest gifts was his spirit of friendliness. Every one was quickly swept into the circle of his genial kindness, whether people in positions of leadership or those living in obscurity. His contacts were world-wide but never officious. He was the ideal peace-maker, consistently seeking to bridge the gaps of misunderstanding and prejudice. He once made the remark that he wished that the word 'peace-maker' might be written on his tombstone. It was because Dr. Hume saw the good in people that he was able to minister to them so effectively and to bring the good out of them.

My first week in India, in November 1912, was spent in the home of Dr. and Mrs. Hume. From that day to this, their home has always been to me the symbol of beauty and culture. The front door was ever open with its hospitable welcome, and no one could spend a few hours in that home without being lifted to a higher plane of spiritual living. The writer recalls, with a smile, numerous instances when casual Indian visitors were brought to the table at short notice and asked to share the family meal. Momentary embarrassment quickly disappeared in the atmosphere of good fellowship. Some years ago a young missionary couple spent the first few months of their Indian sojourn in the Hume home, while studying Marathi. They later bore testimony to the fact that during all that time never once had they heard disparaging remarks made concerning fellow-workers. Who could measure the spiritual influence of such a home?

Another vivid memory is that of Dr. Hume's intellectual eagerness. I frequently sought opportunities to visit the Hume home in order that I might peruse the new books which would invariably be found on the living room table. They would be books concerning religion, theology, poetry, history and kindred subjects. My first introduction to the study of Indian religions was through Dr. Hume whose enthusiasm for such studies was contagious. No subject seemed outside his range of thought. Whether it was a question of missionary policy or an important event in world politics, Dr. Hume maintained an attitude of eager interest. The writer always found him ready to receive new suggestions. He thus symbolized for me the open mind, continually growing, and never satisfied with the status quo.

A third quality which always impressed me was his loyalty to conviction. I do not recall that Dr. Hume ever hesitated to express his honest opinion, no matter how difficult the occasion might be. He had the capacity for leadership to a rare degree and was prepared to defend his viewpoint against opposition. During one of his furlough periods in America he became the centre of controversy because of some outspoken remarks about the Christian message to India. Yet through it all he kept his poise and did not allow himself to become bitter when subjected to criticism. He knew that he had a mission in life and his loyalty to this mission never wavered. Yet he was ever ready to reach reasonable adjustments with others, firmly believing that practical compromises are the path of wisdom.

A fourth well-known characteristic of Dr. Hume was his sense of humour. For him to see the funny side of an incident was a perfectly natural process. By expression, gesture, or word, he could keep his audience convulsed, his ample fund of stories being always available. Many of these stories are still doing yeoman service throughout his circle of friends. Undoubtedly his ready wit endeared him to his associates, and his ability to enjoy a good joke smoothed the path of many a conference.

Fifth, I have often drawn inspiration from Dr. Hume's breadth of outlook. He maintained no mental compartments. With officials it was his custom to be on friendly terms. He fraternized with people of every community and found time to support a variety of good causes. When the question of church union came to the front, he threw himself enthusiastically into the task of organizing the North India United Church, becoming its first moderator. The National Missionary Society owed much to his wise counsel and sympathetic interest. Free from cramping prejudice, and anxious to share in all wholesome movements Dr. Hume could be counted upon to lend a helping hand.

Sixth, this brief appreciation would not be complete without a reference to the simplicity of his prayer life. The story goes that once at the dinner table, after saying grace, he was reminded by an absent-minded member of the family that grace had not yet been said. 'All right', he remarked, 'we will say another', and proceeded to do so, without affectation. He could drop into prayer without the slightest effort, carrying others with him into the presence of His Heavenly Father. Possessing a Christ-like spirit it was but natural that he should live close to his Father and seek His guidance at all times. It was because he had found God that he could share Him with others. Whether by interview or with pen, he had a genius for personal evangelism. Dr. Mable of the Baptist Board once remarked to the writer that Dr. Hume had no peer in the art of getting close to the Indian heart.

If I were asked to sum up Dr. Hume's notable qualities and the significance of his contribution to India, I would apply to him, I think, the term forward-looking. He was a pioneer, calling to the rest of us to join him in the search for the good life. His readiness to witness for his Master did not impair his appreciation of concrete realities and, as a result, two rows of new houses stand across the street as a testimony to his interest in better housing.

If Dr. Hume were alive today, he would doubtless be an active member of the international fellowship which is doing its best to break down communal prejudices. Those of us who are attempting to pass on the torch dare not ignore our debt to those who have preceded us. Dr. Hume's influence in Ahmednagar continues to be a stimulating force, urging us forward to that day when the abundant life, of which Jesus told us, may find more adequate expression in the lives of men and women everywhere.

THE INDIAN CHRISTIAN MARRIAGE ACT. The Editor,

Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I have read with great interest the article in your issue of November 11th on the 'Indian Christian Marriage Act' and also the previous articles to which reference is made. Most Christians will sympathise with the writer in his plea that Section 68 of the Act should not be used for purposes of persecution or as an aid to proselytism. I am afraid, however, that the writer has not fully understood the reasons which have led missionaries to take up cases under this section. In the first place it must be admitted that every community has certain rules of order to which its members should subscribe and if they deliberately break these rules, which have been framed in the interest of the community itself, they can hardly expect to escape the consequences. Just as in the case of the Sarda Act many high-minded individuals believe that they are called upon to bring to the notice of the courts breaches in this Act because of their disastrous consequences to Hindu Society, so missionaries and Indian Christian leaders believe that deliberate contraventions of Section 68 of the Indian Christian Marriage Act have disastrous consequences for Christian Society and so cannot be easily condoned. For the few cases that come before the courts there are many more cases in which the parties unwittingly offended which are not dealt with in this way.

In the second place it must be remembered that a breach of the Act renders the marriage null and void and entails consequences on the parties themselves that may lead to great evils. They do not always realise them at the time but I have come across cases when the validity of a marriage has been questioned for this reason.

Further, if the bride is a Christian it is necessary for her own protection that the sanction of the Act should be held in reserve. In some of the communities from which Christians come the marriage tie is not so powerful as in the higher Hindu castes and we have found that if a Christian girl marries a Hindu according to Hindu usage she has no protection against desertion as the State does not recognise the marriage. There is no doubt at all that if the missionaries were to acquiesce in a wholesale evasion of Section 68 of the Indian Christian Marriage Act it would be disastrous for many Christian girls who have no knowledge of the consequences of their action and who are forced by their parents, often against their own will, into a Hindu marriage.

I have read carefully the decisions of the Allahabad and Madras High Courts on this matter and it has always seemed to me that from the point of view of the Act itself the Madras High Court decision is the correct one. As long as the law remains as it is, it is surely not to be expected that the Christian Church should condone a serious breach of the law which would in their opinion result not only in general laxity in regard to marriage but also in disastrous consequences for many Christian girls.

Surely the remedy is in the hands of Hindu Society if it would only agree to a general civil marriage act making necessary the registration of all marriages by a civil authority and securing monogamy.

In that case there would be no need for a special legislation for different religious communities and the one Act would govern all the communities and give the civil protection necessary to both parties and to the children of the marriage. The Christian church cannot consent to the abolition of the protection afforded by this Act so long as the whole position in regard to marriage remains so uncertain as it is today for large sections of Hindu society.

If all the parties to the marriage have made it perfectly clear that they are no longer members of the Christian church and there is no question of the girl, who is usually a minor, being compelled against her will to accept the Hindu form of marriage, I do not think the church has any right to invoke the aid of Section 68 and I feel sure that Christian opinion will generally agree with the writer of the Articles in his contention upon this point. If in other cases the parties wish to remain in the Christian church, as is usually the case in my experience, and at the same time contravene the church's rule and the State's laws regarding marriage, it is surely unjust to blame missionaries for resorting to the courts to stop a practice which they believe will be disastrous to the parties and to the community generally.

I have always had a great admiration for the Indian Social Reformer and have been a regular subscriber for the past 25 years and I feel sure that you will understand that the position is not so simple as the writer of the article makes out.

THE ACTIVE LEAGUE.

(By B. BRADFIELD.)

While the Disarmament Conference goes slowly for a while, due to the check given to it by Germany, other activities of the League of Nations move apace.

League men are setting about various tasks with no less vigour than before, perhaps even more. A well-known public man of America is immediately to take up his duties as High Commissioner for the refugees from Germany, to assist them in finding means of livelihood; an Irishman is making preparations for his three years job as High Commissioner of Danzig, a very delicate post just now; five notable men—English, French, Italian, Spanish and Mexican—are on their way to the Gran Chaco to restore peace to Bolivia and Paraguay while five others are already in Leticia on the same mission for Colombia and Peru. These are amongst some of the most recent appointments to the army of League men at work in various parts of the world.

At the present moment the Mandates Commission is in session, putting its usual searching questions to the representatives of the Mandatory Powers on the internal affairs and the well-being of the inhabitants of Syria and the Lebanon, of the Cameroons and Togoland, of certain Pacific Islands and of Iraq up to last Autumn. The Central Opium Board is also in session dealing with stocks of raw opium, with exports of narcotics, and with seizure of smuggled goods. An Inter-Governmental Conference is engaged in drawing up an agreement for providing refugees—Russian, Armenian, Syrian and others—with more secured positions in the countries where they find themselves, with access to courts, the right to education, liability to taxation and so on, and also the granting of Nansen passports.

Obviously there is no slacking down of the League's general machinery, the committees and conferences of each week being all designed to one and the same end, the friendly co-operation between nations which will make arms obsolete.

WOMEN'S TEMPERANCE CONVENTION AT CAWNPORE.

(By M. S. V. PERRILL.)

The 37th annual meeting of the United Provinces Division of the Women's Christian Temperance Union was held in Cawnpore on November 9th and 10th, at the Presbyterian Church. Thirty-six delegates and officers were present representing the local Unions in Agra, Aligarh, Hardoi, Budaon, Kasganj, Meerut, Muttra, Moradabad, Cawnpore and Lucknow, and reports were also received from Almora, Jhansi and Pithoragarh. In several places, Hindus and Moslems have joined forces with the Christians in Temperance effort, notably Pithoragarh, Moradabad and Lucknow.

Several new methods of arousing public opinion in Temperance work were reported, such as the wearing of coloured badges by the Temperance crusaders, the signing of the total abstinence pledge, the teaching of Temperance in schools in connection with the subject of Hygiene, and the use of scouts in helping to prepare petitions for the closing of obnoxious liquor shops.

The reports of the ways in which money was collected revealed great sacrifice and ingenuity. The money had been collected in annas and pice from the poor; by the giving of Temperance dramas, story-telling contests, concerts; and by personal solicitation from friends of the Temperance cause.

Lectures given by Mr. S. P. Andrews-Dube, of the Servants of India Society, and Dr. F. M. Perrill, Editor of the Indian Witness, were greatly appreciated.

The following officers were elected for the coming year:—

President:	Mrs. N. Jordan: Moradabad.
Vice-President:	Mrs. F. M. Perrill: Lucknow.
Recording Secretary:	Mrs. M. C. Singh: Cawnpore.
Corresponding Secretary:	Miss P. Phillips: Budaon.
Treasurer:	Mrs. C. D. Rockey: Bareilly.

A Resolution was passed urging the introduction of compulsory scientific Temperance instruction into the schools of the Province. The National W. C. T. U. was memorialized to arrange a gradation of the annual dues to be paid according to the financial ability of the members.

Next year's Convention is to be held in Lucknow.

TANSEN ANNIVERSARY.

The death anniversary of Tansen, the famous musician of Akbar's court, is celebrated every year at his tomb near Gwalior. This year, writes a correspondent in the Hindustan Times, the celebrations began on the 12th November and lasted till 14th. On the first day the proceedings began with Hari Katha by Pandit Shajapurkar. Then the students and teachers of the two local music institutions, the Madhav Music College and the Shanker Gandharva Vidyalaya gave a musical performance which lasted till 12 in the night and was much appreciated by the audience.

Next day a 'chaddar' was brought in procession from Gwalior and put on the tombs of Muhammad Ghaus and Tansen. Then the dancing girls of the city and other places who come here every year to pay homage to this great master of music, showed their skill in singing and dancing. One of the descendants of Tansen, Fida Hussain Khan had especially come for the occasion from Jaipur and gave a performance on his Satar.

On the afternoon of the 14th the proceedings which had begun with Hari Katha terminated with Maulud and Fatiha.

BIRTH CONTROL.

I. WHAT AN INDIAN WOMAN THINKS.

So at last the men have begun talking and writing freely about Birth Control! At the Women's Conference at Bhandara, the proposer of the resolution on Birth Control received an interesting message from someone in the audience after her speech was over. "Where is the need of convincing the women? Don't we realise all this? But who is to deal with the men?" I suppose the proposer was somewhat in a fix. But she ought to find out a way now.

It is also a healthy sign that the main opposition to the spread of information about Birth Control has come, so far, from a particular religious point of view only. If it always remains limited to that narrow circle, one need not bother much about it. Haven't we already had sufficient experience of a particular kind of hybrid culture and pseudo religious outlook?

It is all very well for indifferent people to engage in wordy and lofty discussions about whether a thing is right or not. Lost in their empty abstractions, they have no time to think of the agonies that hundreds and hundreds of women of, say, the lower middle class are suffering from day to day. Only a few days ago, there happened an incident in one of the Maternity Homes in Nagpur which ought to be a pungent eye-opener to all those who have any vision left. A woman went there for her fifth or sixth delivery. Her husband was a clerk. There was no other elderly person in the house. A kindly neighbour had taken charge of the rest of the children, the youngest being just above a year. It was a hard job for the neighbour and not a very pleasant thing for the child too. The mother lay in the hospital, comfortable for all appearances but with her mind being torn to pieces with thoughts about the children she had left behind, their little comforts, their hazy future, the bare maintenance that her husband could afford, and one day she burst into tears. "Is there no way to stop this?" The poor thing enquired. A more enlightened lady was near her. She gave her her address, asked her to see her when she was up, once more assured her that there was a way out. The harassed mother was so overcome with gratitude that she fell at the feet of her more enlightened sister. This is not the only incident of its kind. There are so many girls in the same boat.

That some refuse to undertake the responsibilities of parenthood because they want to be free to 'enjoy' life, is no argument against the spread of the knowledge about contraceptives. There is no justice in compelling the majority to remain in darkness and procreate like cats and dogs, because some might escape from their responsibility altogether. The same about the problem of the spread of immorality. The rise of immorality did not wait for the discovery of contraceptives. It has been there always, and however strictly the purists may ban contraceptives, those who are inclined that way will get the latest about them. The chances are that they will do more harm to themselves and to others, by getting at them by the back door. There can be no greater condemnation of our present code of morals and ideas of decency than this, that just those that ought to know everything about sex and its significance, are debarred from it. It is an intolerable insult to all decent folk to say that their morals are based on their ignorance about how to sin without being found out.

—Hitavada.

2. A CATHOLIC VIEW.

Rev. Father Basenach S. J. delivered an interesting address at the weekly meeting of the Madras Rotary Club on "Birth Control."

Rev. Father Basenach prefaced his remarks by saying that Malthus had only one idea. He saw large numbers of poverty-stricken and unhappy people herded in slums round the newly built factories. He hated misery and vice—and, of course, vice inevitably went with poverty. Contemplating the dreary scene he was moved to effect a remedy. It was the theory of Malthus that the population always tended to outstrip the means of subsistence and that the human race was neither ingenious enough nor active enough to increase its means of subsistence in adequate proportion. How he knew this for an incontestable fact, he never told them; nor was he able to refute Godwin who said that it was nonsense to talk about not being able to maintain a population until we had tried. Being a religious man, in fact a parson by profession, he felt bound to ensure that any means he might suggest for limiting the population would be in keeping with his religious principles. He insisted upon delayed marriages and strict continency or chastity in the unmarried. Francis Place accepted Malthus' thesis and went one worse. He proposed the logical and practical means of restricting population—contraception. Continuing, the speaker said: "The doctrines of Malthus and Place have not only the character of the cure-all, they have also the distinctive mark of all evil sociology and legislation. They have as their only basis, expediency."

"It is also certain that social conditions ought not to impose moral heroism or ask, as ours do, martyrdom from half the population. But it is not my purpose here to criticise either our social conditions abominable as they are, nor even to point out that nearly the whole contraceptive problem is due to them, and therefore, due to that graft and grab which is at the back of nearly all that is socially wrong; nor even, to point out that contraception is at best but a palliative of social wrongs—a mopping up of water when the tap is left running. Neither shall I waste time about the nonsense that is talked about over-population (I am not saying that no sense is ever talked) especially in continents like Australia, India or South America. Nor yet, about standards of life, where an insane snobbishness operates even more evilly than mere desire for comfortableness. No doubt the problem may be considered from all sorts of angles—medical, psychological, economical, political, historical, artistic. But ultimately the scientific discussion resolves itself into a question of a philosophy.

"We have to take the whole man into account, who feels, thinks, and can choose. So even were medical opinion to tell me that contraceptive practices did no harm to the body as such nor even to the nervous system (though fewer and fewer risk saying anything of the sort), I still would say that the point had not been reached, because the human creature was not yet being surveyed as a whole. Doctors specialise in one corner of the world—the sick one, but one corner of life can never be taken as giving us the whole of it and therefore we have to appeal to that science which regards the whole of human activity in the light of its ultimate purpose. But since the majority of people still rule their conduct on a principle of religion, the question becomes chiefly a religious one; a matter in which guidance is expected and sought from some religious authority.

"Speaking before men, most of whom owe no allegiance to the teaching authority of the Catholic Church, I must try to discuss the subject from a standpoint which is common to all Christians. I believe naturally that pretty well every Christian doctrine is needed by anyone who wants to understand human nature, let alone to manage it. So long, for example, as people exclude the certainty of God's existence, of man's obligation, and of sin, they are bound to make a mess of things, because they seek for a solution amid material which provides none.

"We Catholics hold birth prevention to be wrong for everybody, not merely for Catholics; we base our argument not on authority, but on reason, which binds all men, not only Catholics; we hold it as wrong for a non-Catholic to practise it as for Catholics. It is a thing forbidden by the moral law which governs human nature; it is wrong with a wrongness that is antecedent to any ecclesiastical law. The sum total of duties whose knowledge we derive from the understanding of our nature and of our relations to all other beings, is the moral law, that is, the natural law for man. Every act contrary to those duties is a violation of God's plan. It would indeed be an extraordinary thing that God should intend certain purposes to be realised by endowing certain natures with definite functions and potencies, and that nevertheless man should be able, without moral fault, to thwart that plan. Now the nature of our faculties is manifested to us in the mode of their necessary activities; and their purpose is revealed by the good they necessarily achieve by their normal activities.

"Now there are certainly some actions which every man and woman, taking them as normal beings in possession of their faculties, admit to be contrary to rational nature, that is, morally wrong. No one would defend the kidnapping of a child. If any individual invades the right of parents to offspring we say with truth that he is offending against a basic natural right not merely against a legal or conventional right. A man should be convinced of this if it is considered for a moment that it would be impossible for families, his own family included, or the State, to persist, if a mother could be deprived of her child. To say this is just to say that the kidnapper is violating the law of his own human nature, for he is acting irrationally, contrary to nature's postulates and dictates.

"Now the processes and the exercise of our mental and bodily faculties have quite definite purposes. We know that this is so from experience and observation. The function of sex has a fixed fundamental purpose, namely to pass on life, when natural conditions are favourable. A man would therefore be acting irrationally if he used his sexual function in such a way, that by some artificial contrivance, mechanical chemical or otherwise, he prevented that faculty from doing precisely that very thing which it alone is designed to achieve. Sexual intercourse is a particular, well-defined act. It is this act, and no other, which God, in Nature, uses to propagate the human race. It is this act, and no other, which God has designed as the full physical expression of love between man and wife. It is this act and no other, which Nature has fashioned to fulfil animal sexual desire. All these purposes in nature (and probably others of which we are ignorant) are fulfilled together by this very definite particularised act. But, the contraceptive act is not this natural well-defined act of sexual intercourse. It is an act of man's own fashioning; he uses the function and at the same time, blocks the direction of that function. According to the classical tradition of thought, from Plato and Aristotle, through Aquinas, to Spinoza, Leibnitz, Hegel, from the standpoint of scientific Ethics, pleasure is not the constitutive part of human activity, but a property flowing from it. It is not something in itself but the accompaniment of doing something. If that something is good then the pleasure is good; if that something is bad, then the pleasure is bad. Consequently the rightness or wrongness of a particular pleasure can only be determined by reference to the goodness or badness of the act to which it attaches. The deliberate performance of the sexual act apart from its due circumstances or with a direct and positive exclusion of its natural end, namely procreation, is a perversion or frustration of nature and therefore morally and intrinsically wrong; pleasure, however refined, can do nothing to legitimatise it. On the contrary, the accompanying pleasure will be bad. In the contraceptive act man is indulging in a sham, an isolated aspect deliberately divorced from the wholeness of a human situation, a nervous excitement instead of the living union of two in one flesh.

"To attempt by artificial means to frustrate the natural dynamism of act and end is of necessity to introduce a conflict in the material and in the moral order. To the reality of this conflict—and of the injury it causes—all sound science, gynæcology and psychology bears witness. In the decline and fall of empires lies the record of this law. Its operation in our own society and in our own time is obvious in the extremities of error and action into which they have been led who refuse obedience to the natural rule. Men and women who started as advocates of birth prevention are now engaged in open war on life. The war they wage takes many forms: upon the sources of life in men and women which is sterilisation; upon life in potentiality, which is birth prevention; upon life unborn, which is abortion; upon life in being which is Euthanasia; or, in simple speech, murder and suicide. We are told that the Christian idea is opposed to the modern world; this is true, we are opposed to it, but only to the extent that the modern world is inhuman. And the reason why the Catholic Church condemns contraception is that it is inhuman, a thing wrong in itself, an unnatural vice, a course of action which is contrary to the divine will and therefore an evil for man, the state and the race.

"People are apt to neglect the worldwide aspects and effects of birth prevention and to concentrate on the hard cases in married life....But are the hardest cases in married life harder than the plight of the young, whose financial or other circumstances make matrimony impossible for them? Can it be maintained that, taking one thing with another, the difficulties of the married to-day are harder than they were in generations past? Is it not that perhaps we are softer, rather than the cases are harder? Still we do have for such cases the most genuine sympathy and understanding; but the position that contraception is wrong in itself, and to be condemned as an unnatural practice is not weakened in the least by the existence of extremely hard cases within marriage, any more than the position that dishonesty or lying is a sin by the existence of similarly hard cases in business or private life."

Concluding the speaker said:—

"It appears to be constantly assumed that the ordinary Christian or disciple of Christ cannot be expected to conform to a discipline which is very hard and which he or she may feel to be intolerable. This I must meet with a flat negative. It is quite true that Christ never taught us to seek pain for its own sake; but he certainly did tell us that, if we would be His disciples, we must be prepared for even the extreme of sacrifice—even the sacrifice of life itself—by martyrdom. To be a Christian is to accept an unlimited liability; and even the hardest case may not affect his loyalty to His Master and God. Christianity has never been a religion of escape. Every age demands martyrdom of some kind and our age calls for martyrs who are willing to suffer for the sake of morality."

DEAR DOCTOR EINSTEIN. *

Sixteen years ago, the people of the United States were engaged in a war, as most of them believed, to preserve democracy and freedom from annihilation at the hands of a ruthless German government. We were among the minority who opposed that war, not merely because we could not share the prevailing view of the Allied nations as innocent and the Central Powers as solely to blame, but even more because we believed the war method could never eradicate militarism from Germany or save democracy for the world. Today, notwithstanding the Allies' victory, German militarism is again in the saddle and democracy is everywhere in jeopardy.

Such an outcome was not readily discernible in 1917 to the eyes of those who desperately feared a German conquest. As the pressure of that fear descended over the nation, weighted by official propaganda, we saw one pacifist comrade after another swept into support of the war by the tide of military violence. Many of these had long protested their pacifism and had preached the doctrine of love for enemies; but they could not withstand by a general faith the concrete appeal of war and the presence of a menacing foe.

You will forgive us, then, if we say that we felt a similar loss when you, who so nobly served the pacifist cause by your open espousal of it under any and all conditions, recently shifted your position. When you anticipated that Belgian war resisters would be "greatly astonished" by what you were about to write them, you were correct; for even if you had come to that crossroads of the mind where honest men can only speak with frankness, pacifists had the right to expect from you the most cogent of reasons, the most profound of arguments. Yet you wrote as follows:

"A little while ago one could have hoped to fight militarism in Europe successfully by individually refusing to serve in the army. But today we are in the presence of entirely different circumstances. There is in the centre a state (Germany) which publicly is preparing for war by every means. Under these conditions some countries, particularly France and Belgium, find themselves in very great danger and they can only count upon their own preparation..... That is why I tell you frankly, "If I were a Belgian I would not refuse military service under the present circumstances, but I would, on the contrary, accept it with a clear conscience with the sentiment of a contribution toward securing European civilization." This does not mean that I renounce my previous opinion. I desire nothing more than to see the moment come when refusal of military service will be the means for an efficacious struggle for the progress of humanity."

What your letter declares is centrally this: that war resistance of individuals is, to be considered purely as an individual influence; that its social utility is limited to those periods and circumstances when there is no serious threat from a reckless antagonist; that military victory, so futile 15 years ago, would in 1933 accomplish towards the security of Europe what it failed so signally to do before.

* Reprinted from The World To-morrow.

Stirred by regret rather than irritation, we are compelled to say in utter candour that this is no argument at all. It constitutes, instead, an incredibly naive evasion of every important issue. As you extraordinarily have forgotten, war resisters never expected individual war resistance to stop wars or prevent them; yet the brave men who have resisted the war system through their unflinching opposition have been of the greatest pragmatic value in keeping alive the method of uncompromising non-co-operation with war and paving the way for the adoption of that method by important labour, religious, and educational organizations throughout the world. These, even with their present strength and partial conviction, have already on several occasions prevented wars which might have developed into ghastly conflicts of large dimensions.

We hold no brief, of course, for Hitlerism. But what created Hitlerism so much as those very policies of increased armaments, enforcement of unfair judgments, rampant militarism, and stern vindictiveness which have characterized the programme of embattled France? That German public which follows the flashing will-o'-the-wisp of the hooked cross is simply carrying to absurdity (of rather, pathology) the selfsame principles which have been urged consistently since the war on the French and Belgian people by their governments. Even now, a war for any reason might eliminate Hitler; but it could never wipe out Hitlerism.

In 1929 you revealed a courage which we know you still possess, but an insight we fear you have temporarily lost, when you stated in the suppressed Czech journal, Die Wahrheit, that in another war you would: "unconditionally refuse to do war service, direct or indirect, and would try to persuade my friends to take the same stand, regardless of how the cause of the war should be judged."

We commend to you the clarity of those views. They were sane in 1929; they are sane in 1933. Their rationality thousands of war resisters the world around, unshaken, will continue to attest. Without bitterness, though with profound sorrow, these men and women will cease to follow you. They will, on the contrary, pit themselves even more vigorously, unblinded, against militarism and war-militarism, as international as disease; war, as ubiquitous as death.

GANDHIJI ON HIS MISSION. *

"POLITICS IS NOTHING TO ME."

Addressing a huge gathering at Amraoti last week, Gandhiji said: "I have visited many places throughout the length and breadth of this country, and such big meetings are to me the manifestations of the grace of God. I believe that with God's favour alone can we conduct such huge assemblies. With His grace also, I have taken up the Harijan work. It is a religious work, and should therefore be done with truth, peace and sacrifice. It would not be done otherwise. If we want to expiate for the injustice done to the Harijans, and if we want to atone for the wrongs we, the Savarna Hindus, are still doing them, we must get down from the shoulders of those poor people. We must treat them as we treat the Savarna Hindus. I would like to tell you all that, unless we behave with them on equal terms, there is no chance of our own improvement either. I visited the Harijan quarters with the help of Dr. Patwardhan, and have now heard the address read out to me by the Municipal Committee here. If the Municipality of this place could not do anything in this matter, it could not be blamed. I have seen many other Municial committees, and the conditions are just the same all over. But I must say that now, even the western scientists after their research, have come to the conclusion that if we leave any particular section of our society out of our fold, we are sure to be down economically.

* From the Free Press Journal.

"After 25 years' of observation my belief is being strengthened that wealth should always go hand in hand with religion. There should be harmony between religion and wealth. I have come to realise from my Harijan work that one, who tries for wealth in accordance with religion, gets both. I believe it to be the duty of every Savarna Hindu that he should try to take up the Harijan into his fold.

"If we do our duty towards the Harijans, all of us, Hindus, Muslims, Parsis and Christians will live peacefully. To my mind there is no better way to unity of these people than Harijan work. Now I must tell you what every one of you can do in this respect. The Harijan movement is a great "Yagnya," and each of you can put his little bit in it. Those who have money can give it for this cause. Those who have the leisure and intelligence, can teach the Harijan boys and give them lessons in personal hygiene and cleanliness. Congressmen are doing the work at present. But the masses of India are like a sea. I know that all these people are not Congressmen. Still they can come and do this work. It is not any social kind of work. It is the religious duty of every one of you.

"I do not value politics as much as I value this work. Politics is nothing to me. It is my belief that, if we do this work with religious faith, everything will be obtained. I am not travelling with any other intention in this work. And when I see people assembling in such huge numbers I hope that they will stand by me in this work. In July last, the Harijan Seva Sangh was started, and some of you must have taken the vow to wipe out this curse of untouchability. It is the birth-right of Harijans to make use of public institutions and to enter into the temples. But as long as there is a single soul boycotted as being a Harijan I shall not regard untouchability as being wiped out totally. It is up to you, therefore that you should change your hearts and take the Harijans as your own.

"The Harijan Seva Sangh is composed of people of different schools of thought but they can do this together. Workers in this field should not aspire after any kind of honour or title. They should not have the slightest tinge of personal interest or selfish motives. This work should also be free from any sort of political colour. There is no doubt that it will have some political meaning, but I do not value political things as much as this. Harijan work is a purification of the Hindu religion. I have great hopes in this matter. I have always been an optimist, and my optimism in this case is increasing every day but even if I fail it remains my duty to continue this work. Very few pure workers have so far come forward. I therefore pray to God that He should give you all the necessary strength and guidance to do your duty in this respect.

"Some of the women of this place have offered me ornaments and the little children gave me a small silver casket which I wish to put for auction. I shall accept money from you all; be it even a cowree, but it should be given with a pure heart. I assure you that it will do you good and will be helpful to the Harijan."

"BALKANISING" INDIA.

In a statement headed "The Balkanisation of India" Sir Henry Lawrence, who once acted as Governor of Bombay, and was for a number of years Commissioner in Sind, writes:—

The report of the Joint Select Committee should become one of the historical documents of the British transcending the Durham report on Canada of a century ago. The scheme of the White Paper appears to be gravely affected by considerations arising out of the Hindu-Moslem conflict. While it is impossible to ignore that conflict, it is fatal to allow it to override reason and justice. Fear is paralysing Europe now. We must not let it paralyse our action in India. As Sir Austen Chamberlain has said in the House, now and again in the affairs of men there comes a moment when courage is safer than prudence.

In the light of the tragical mistakes made at Versailles, and the consequent chaos in Europe, the Joint Select Committee has an opportunity now of pointing out the right road to take in India, and to protest against its Balkanisation.

Europe is busy attempting to wipe out the barriers to prosperity caused by the uprising of so many petty states and their inter jealousies. Are we not now in India repeating the same disastrous error in the creation of new small states which can have no hope whatever of establishing stable and competent government?

The present territorial divisions of India were formed haphazard through accidents of wars at different periods. Is not this a heaven-sent opportunity to reform and redress these accidents of fate? For example, why was Sind attached to the province of Bombay? Because Sir Charles Napier conquered Sind in 1842 and at that time the Punjab was not within the British Empire. Sir Charles Napier took his army from Poona and the conquest gained by the Bombay army fell to the sphere of the Bombay Government. Similar chances ruled over the creation of the Central Provinces and Orissa.

No man can foretell what period may elapse before the Princes have determined to sign their agreement on entry into the Federation, and before the Federation itself comes into active operation. Between the publication of Lord Durham's report and the passing of the North America Act there intervened a period of 28 years, between 1839 and 1867.

Let us look ahead. It may be that the final decision of these vast Indian problems may rest with the next generation. In all the mosaic of the provinces in India no part is so amorphous as the Central Provinces, and none has shown more clearly the inability of its population to set up a government. If now we consider the lesson presented by the course of recent events in Central and South Eastern Europe, we will recognise the importance of avoiding disruption into non-economic or non-political units.

The White Paper proposes to increase the number of governments to 11, whereas the opportunity should be taken both on financial and administrative grounds to reduce the number as far as possible. It is sufficient to enunciate the principle without defining precisely the areas and boundaries which can only be determined after an adhoc enquiry, but it may be suggested tentatively that the Central Provinces, Assam, Sind, Orissa and perhaps the North West Frontier Province, should all be amalgamated into larger entities. The redistribution of areas is indeed no novelty in the Indian history of the last century, nor should such a proposal disturb statesmen who have seen the redistribution of Europe within the last few years albeit that redistribution has proceeded on the wrong lines, in the realp wrong direction, under the fatal slogan, adopted for war purposes, of self-determination. This slogan denies the whole process of civilization through the centuries and would revert the United Kingdom itself to the conditions of the Heptarchy.

It is recognised in the White Paper (vide paragraphs 32 and 60 of the Proposals) that the breakdown of the finances may require the re-consideration of the whole scheme. It is clear that all financial authorities are very seriously disturbed as to the dangers of such a breakdown, and no step should be omitted which can improve the financial situation. The most obvious step is to reduce the number of separate Governments with their inevitable tendency to profligate extravagances and to restrict the experiment to areas which are likely to produce Indian statesmen of the necessary enlightenment and ability. The hope of securing statesmen of this description in the four areas which I have named is very slight. The basis of these reforms is a confidence that India can produce such statesmen; and it is the function of this Committee to establish the conditions in which that confidence can be fulfilled.

BORDERLINES OF FAITHS. *

(By DR. J. H. HUTTON.)

It is not in its devotional aspect that the census is concerned with religion, but in its social, and it cannot be denied that society in India is still largely organised on a basis of caste and religion, and social conduct is much influenced by practices which may not be in themselves religious but which are subject to religious sanctions. . . . The social importance of religious difference is reflected in the controversial disputes about religious terminology for census purposes. The census terms are:—Hindu, Jain, Buddhist, Sikh, Zoroastrian, Jew, Muslim, Christian, Tribal and Others. This is the most practical division available, but is admittedly not satisfactory since difficulty arises in the case of many of these terms, particularly so in that of the term Hindu which is not entirely exclusive of some of the other terms used.

Many Hindus, for instance, claim that Sikhs, Jains and Buddhists are also Hindu in as much as their faiths had their origin in the Hindu religion. On the other hand, this claim is stoutly repudiated by the great majority of Sikhs and it was therefore necessary to treat the terms Hindu and Sikh as mutually exclusive. In the case of Jains many, but by no means all, regard themselves as Hindu and orders were issued that any Jain who wished to record the fact that he was also Hindu could do so and the tables would show in a footnote the number of Jains who consider themselves Hindus. In the United Provinces the Census Superintendent reports that the present tendency among Jains is toward segregation from rather than amalgamation with Hindus and that inter-marriage with Hindu families is becoming more unpopular, though there is less objection to taking Hindu wives than to giving brides to Hindu males. It was claimed by the Hindu Mahasabha that a few Buddhists adopted the same position as Jains who regard themselves as Hindus, but from Buddhists as well as Jains protests were received against the possibility of their being classified as Hindus. In order to get round the ambiguity it was also ordered that Buddhists might likewise describe themselves as Hindu, and the totals of Buddhists who so regard themselves will be found in footnotes. In all 12,326 out of a total for India of 1,252,631 Jains, and 70 Buddhists out of 12,786,831 described themselves as being Hindus, and of these 526 Jains and Buddhists actually appear as Hindus in the statistical tables.

* Reprinted from the "Census of India, 1931"

Some other schismatics have similarly an ambiguous position. In 1881 Kabirpanthi and Satnam were shown as religions separate from Hinduism. Since that year, they have been incorporated with Hindus and on this occasion they have been similarly treated except in Bombay where a few Kabirpanthis and Dadupanthis who did not return themselves as Hindu have been shown under "Others". It would be natural to suppose that the remaining religions might at any rate be regarded as quite distinct yet while the border line between tribal religions and some aspects of Hinduism is not at all easy to draw, it is often just as hard to define it between Hinduism and Islam, and even between Hinduism and Christianity, in the case of a number of intermediate sects which offer points of identity with both.

Except for a body in Tinnevely that claims to be both Jew and Christian, the Jews remain a much more clearly defined body, and in their case Hindu influence would seem to go no further than inducing the Beni-Israel to add a Hindu or a Hinduised second name to the Hebraio one, but the Indian Christians of South India go further. Caste is admittedly observed by Catholics, while some Protestants who profess not to observe it do admit a ban on commensality. The Catholics appear to use caste marks in some cases, and there was a cause célèbre in the Madras courts in which an overzealous imported priest, who had destroyed as unchristian the wall which ran the length of the aisle to separate the caste from the outcaste Christians, was prosecuted by his flock in consequence. The Catholics, besides observing caste even to conventional privileges in dress and ornaments, use the tali instead of a ring in marriage and permit the retention of other customs, such as a tabu "for reasons of hygiene" on contacts with persons polluted by childbirth.

On the other hand certain features of the Lingayat belief seem to have been borrowed from Christianity, as a doctrine of immaculate conception and the practice of burying the dead. A forest tribe in North Kanara, now Hindu, has family names of Christian origin. In the case of Islam, however, the border line is much less definite. Even saints of Christianity, Islam and Judaism are themselves subject to some confusion. In the Near East Elijah, al-Khidr (The Green One) and St. George are confused or identified generally, while boys born on St. Demetrius' Day are called Kasim. Confusion of this kind is probably to be found among Indian outcastes such as Lelbegis, but it goes still further with the Chet-Rami sect of the Punjab, who worship the Christian Trinity plus a Hindu-Muslim trinity consisting of Allah the Creator, Parmeshwar the Preserver, and Khuda the Destroyer. There is thus a very real difficulty sometimes in deciding whether a particular body is Muslim or Hindu; and since the census actually took place there have been some searchings of heart as to the Sathpantis or Pirpantis of Gujarat, Kachh and Khandesh. These people are Mathia Kunbis by caste, and an offshoot of the Leya Kunbis, and seem to have been returned at the census as Hindus; they are said to follow the Atharva Veda, which is perhaps more magical than religious, and they worship at the tombs of Muslim saints at Pirana and elsewhere, from which they get the alternative name for their sect, and they observe as their sacred book a collection of the precepts of Imam Shah the Pir of Pirana; they observe the Ramazan, repeat the kalima and bury their dead with both Muslim and Hindu prayers. On the other hand, they keep the holi and diwali and their marriages are conducted by Brahmins, so that they appear, on the whole, to be Hindus socially but rather Muslims by religion. This position is emphasised by the fact that while a religious authority, the Shankaracharya of the Sankeshwar and Karavir

Maths, pronounces them to be without the pale of Hinduism, the Hindu Mahasabha, a frankly communal organisation, proclaims that they are within it. Another Hindu organisation has urged these Mathias to abandon the worship of Muslim saints. But in truth mere worship at the burial places of holy men is hardly a test of religion at all, since there are many shrines holy to more than one faith, and the holy ones of one religion often survive the superimposition of another and adapt themselves to the change as Badar Makan, the shrine of a Muslim pir in Chittagong, becomes Buddha Makan to an Arakan Buddhist. So in Paphos the Cypriot peasant worships even the Virgin Herself as Panchagia Aphroditessa. The truth is that the shrines of the dead are places impregnated with the fertilising soul-matter of the departed great ones and the cult of them goes back to a totally pre-Hindu phase, which is still represented in the tribal religions, and appears in other practices of some Muslims, the implications of which have been forgotten though the practices remain, as the case of tombstones of phallic design, which may be seen even in the Khyber Pass, for instance; while the Muslims of Malay use stone ones of different but likewise significant designs for the different sexes. A case not unlike that of the Mathia Kunbis is to be seen in that of the Nayitas of Malwa who "share in equal degree the Muslim and Hindu religious beliefs," worshipping Ganesh as well as Allah, using Hindu names and dress and observing Hindu festivals. It may also be found in the Kuvachandas of Sind and again in the Hussaini Brahmans, who like the Mathias are more or less converted to Islam in faith, but retain Brahmanical practices and claim to eat only with the Sayyids among Muslims. The Malkanas of the United Provinces are another somewhat similar group of Rajput, Jat and Bania origin observing both Hindu and Muslim ceremonies. Many became definitely Hindu as a result of the shuddhi movement, and others returned themselves as Muslim at the census, but the bulk apparently continue to halt between two opinions, and in 1926, when the shuddhi and tanzeem movements were at their height these Malkanas started taking money for conversion and it is said that they made considerable sums by conversion and reconversion to and from Hinduism, Islam and Christianity for which communal zealots were then at any rate able to find money. Bengal affords a number of instances of border-line sects such as that of the Bhagwanias or Satyadharma community, recruited from both Hindus and Muslims, though even within the sect there is no intermarriage, while the Nagarchis of Bakarganj, the Kirtanies of Pabna and Maimansingh and the Chitrakars or Patuas of West Bengal are in the nature of castes rather than sects, whose religion and customs have both Hindu and Muslim features as in the case of the Mathia Kunbis. A fresh movement aimed at the reconciliation of Hinduism and Islam was started during the decade under review by a man who claimed to be an incarnation of Channabasaveswara, but his teachings, though they gained some adherents, aroused much antagonism among the Virasaivas of Mysore State, where the movement started, and led to its suppression.

Another aspect of the confused border line between Islam and Hinduism is to be seen in the customs of the outcastes of the Punjab, where Chuhars, for instance, take Muslim names and even utilise the services of mullahs where they serve Muslim villages or wards, though in the eastern Punjab generally they follow Hindu customs and use Hindu names. Yet there is no such marked difference between one Chuhra and the other that a valid distinction between these two religions can be drawn in his case.

NOTES

Tagore in Bombay:—Rabindranath Tagore has been having a wonderful reception in Bombay. The public has been moved by the sight of the venerable figure patiently sitting in front of the stage watching the audience as the enchanting world of light and colour and sound and rhythmic movement of his creation, unfolded itself before its enraptured vision. The Excelsior theatre has been crowded from floor to ceiling every day. It is pleasant to know that the Viswabharati's burden would be appreciably lightened by the success of the plays. The poet has been in great demand in other directions also. The students of Bombay have been able to persuade him amidst his incessant engagements to give them an address the first part of which we reproduce today. The Exhibition of paintings in the Town Hall has called attention to the many sided activities of the great international institution which the genius of the Poet has raised at Bolpur. About this time last year, Bombay was holding its breath in suspense awaiting the issue of Gandhiji's fast at Yerravda. It has had a veritable feast of the soul in the visions of beauty and the words of profound insight which the Poet has given us in this memorable week.

Nila Nagini Devi:—For many days past nothing was heard of Nila Nagini Devi. She was all the time in the American Mission House at Meerut. From her statement published in the papers it would appear that she has benefitted by her short stay in the Mission House more than by her much longer stay in the defunct Ashram. Her case is an awful warning against empiricism in dealing with human problems.

Indo-Japanese Trade Negotiations:—Referring to the Conference between Japan and India, regarding the trade relations, we observed in the "Reformer" that, whatever its result, it formed a precedent of considerable significance.

The course which the negotiations have taken seems so far, however, to have been calculated to prevent it. The published reports would seem to suggest that the conversations between the Indian and Japanese delegations gave rise occasionally to heat more than to light. This to some extent was to be expected. The Japanese are famous for their courtesy, whereas the latter-day Indian businessmen, especially in Bombay, have cultivated a peremptory manner, which has not commended them even to their own countrymen in other parts of the country. It would be most unfortunate if the relations between India and Japan were made to depend upon negotiations between businessmen. There are far deeper things to be considered than the amount of trade between the two countries. Japan and India are connected by ancient ties of culture and religion, and they both share, to a large extent, the disabilities attaching to Asiatics. It is surprising that while the Lancashire delegation, which came to India at about the same time as the Japanese, perhaps a little later, departed two weeks ago with a Pact with which it seems to be completely satisfied, negotiations with Japan are painfully protracted. It would almost seem that the Government of India are more conscious of their responsibility as an Asiatic power than Indian businessmen.

Indian Prisoners:—The Howard League for Penal Reform has issued a pamphlet entitled "Indian Prisoners" by Mr. Horace G. Alexander at twopence, stating the case for an inquiry into the conditions of Indian penal administration. Mr. Alexander who is well-known in India, has culled his information from the Indian press. He has, however, confined his attention to definite instances. Mr. Alexander demands, in the first place, a sharp distinction between penal and political prisoners. He recommends that political offenders should be located in separate prisons, that living conditions in such "civil disobedience prisons" be improved and that the practice of whipping boys be given up. He suggests an independent investigation into the question of jail administration by experienced penologists of international repute as the only way by which the Government of India can clear its reputation. A refusal to grant such a demand, he asserts, will tend to confirm the worst beliefs. Mr. Alexander has considered the point of view of political prisoners in the main. Miss Craven, Secretary of the Howard League, however, has in her foreword pointed out that a wider question is involved. Penal reform, she writes, is everywhere held up by public ignorance of the realities of prison life. It is only with imprisonment for political opinions that opportunity arises for reliable reviews of the prison system. She, therefore, supports Mr. Alexander's bill for an independent inquiry into the entire question as a step towards advancing the cause of the Howard League. "If India were independent," she writes, "and decided to brutalize her penal laws we should regret it but feel no direct responsibility. So long as the British Raj continues, we ought at least maintain the standards of decency and humanity that were established when Macaulay drafted the Indian Penal Code."

Whipping.—Writing of the treatment of political juvenile offenders in India Mr. Alexander remarks, "It must be here noted with satisfaction that in some Indian provinces young men and boys under 21 years of age have been sent to reformatories instead of to ordinary jail life. But this, though preferable on the whole to prison sentences, is not the general practical, and against it must be set the practice—apparently the growing practice—of whipping or flogging boys. Indians, if one may safely generalize of any people who number hundreds of millions, are a peculiarly sensitive people. Very often they are not physically strong. What is more important, their tradition is not a tradition of the rough-and-tumble of the playground and the sports field, but a tradition of gentleness and non violence. From a fairly extensive knowledge of young Indians and of their proud and sensitive nature, I should say without hesitation that the effect of whipping or flogging an Indian youth must be, in nine cases out of ten, to inflict on his mind a wound that will never heal, without some miraculous counter-treatment of love and gentleness. Corporal punishment of Indian youths is, I venture to say, a most effective means of breeding bitterness and violence in India."

What is the Remedy:—The Dnyanodaya in an editorial writes: "That Hinduism offers suffering India no real remedy is clear from the fact that, to quote Mr. K. Natarajan, 'Among its (Hinduism's) avatars was Buddha who was silent about God, and included in the Hindu cannon was the non-theistic Sankhya philosophy whose founder Kapila' was viewed by the Gita as 'the greatest of perfected ones.' True religion according to Jesus is to 'love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and thy neighbour as thyself.'" Is the Dnyanodaya so sure that Christianity has relieved suffering Europe and suffering America of all their troubles?

The League's New Home:—Mr. B. Bradfield writes from Geneva:—"The continued vitality of the League of Nations, in spite of all set-backs, found vivid expression recently when the League formally received from the hands of the builders its new home. Not for eighteen months yet will it be ready for use but the building is erected and roofed and on its topmost point stands the little tree which it is the custom here always to set up at the moment when a main structure is completed. It was a moment for rejoicing; something had been attempted and something done; and, symbolic of other achievements, it came at a moment well-timed. A number of guests, Genevaise and international, were invited by the five building firms to take part in the little ceremony and a feast for the workmen, with the gift to each of a day's pay, followed. The building is vast, as befits the purpose for which it is destined. It is long and (comparatively) low, like the Jura mountains which form its background. It is of white freestone (from three different countries) and from its flat roof the panorama is magnificent. It is a concrete expression of what the League must mean to the world of the future, a meaning which is being worked out now in the daily tasks of peaceful international organisation which are being pursued without pause or interruption. The Mandates Commission, the Opium Commission the Health Committee, the inter-Governmental Committee for Refugees and others have all been carrying on their work undismayed by such spectacular events as Germany's withdrawal. In these day-to-day activities the strength of the League lies, and the new building which so soon will give them house-room is a splendid reminder of what they may achieve." League supporters as it would appear from this communication, have at last realised that its real sphere of operations is outside politics. Most of the important political events in Europe have occurred without the League's influence.

Bombay Women's Meeting:—Women's organisations in this presidency are apparently concentrating their efforts in opposing reactionary attempts to repeal social legislation. An announcement has been made that a public meeting of the women of Bombay is to be held under the auspices of the Bombay Presidency Women's Council, on Thursday the 7th December 1933, at the Wilson College Hall, Chowpatty, at 4-30 p. m. to protest against any legislative proposals to repeal or relax the prohibition against early marriage, and to support Bills for 'Protection of Minor Girls,' and the "Bill to prevent the Dedication of Women to serve in Hindu Temples." Mrs. Sarojini Naidu has consented to preside over the meeting. All members of the Women's Council are invited to be present, and to bring as many members of the public as are in sympathy with the object of the meeting. After the meeting an "At home" will be held. All women interested in this question though not members of the Council are invited.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, DECEMBER 2, 1932.

IS INDIA OVER-POPULATED?

It has been widely assumed that the last census of India shows that there is over-population in India in relation to food supply, and that the Census Commissioner recommended an official propaganda in favour of Birth Control as the only means of controlling the increase of population. There is little in the Census Commissioner's report to justify this impression. The actual increase of population in India since 1921 was 10.6% on the population of the previous census, that is of the census of 1921, and 39% on the population of India fifty years ago. The increase of population since the 1921 census was 13% in the United States, 18% in Ceylon, 20% in Java and 23% in the outer islands of the Netherlands Indies. The increase of population of England and Wales in the last fifty years was 53.8%. The density of the population for the whole of India is 195 persons to the square mile as against 685 persons per square mile in England and Wales and 127 persons per square mile in Europe as a whole. Thus we see that the increase of population in India during the ten years, 1921 to 1931, was much exceeded by the increase in other countries, and that the increase of population during the last fifty years has been higher in England and Wales and other countries than in India. The Census Commissioner expressly refutes the belief that the population of India will soon outgrow its food production. Referring to the argument of recent Indian writers on the population question that any further increase of population is bound to result in an insufficiency of the food supply, he observes: "Recent experience, however, throws doubt on this theory; the general slump in the prices of food and the difficulty found by cultivators in selling their produce suggest that the danger of a shortage of the food supply is not the most serious aspect of the question." "The present problem in India," he further observes, "would seem to be less the actual total increase of population than the increase of that total population, by far the greater part of course which is occupied in agriculture and allied pursuits; and an additional complication of the problem appears in the fact that cultivating classes in India generally lack the capital required for the extension of cultivation beyond the existing margin." The implication of this statement is clearly brought out by the Census Superintendent of Bengal, whose remarks on population problems are reproduced as an Appendix to the Indian Census report. He writes:—"Like the rest of India Bengal is notable for its undeveloped resources and the inefficiency with which such resources as it has are exploited...It has been estimated that improved methods would result in a reasonable expectation of increased food output of 30% throughout the whole of India." He is of opinion that "the potentialities of development are such that pessimism at a future condition of its population if a considerable increase takes place is not necessarily justified." In fact, the arguments used by the Census Commissioner of India, as well as the Superintendent of Bengal, point rather to the need of an early development of industries than to the adoption of Birth Control as a solution to the economic problem. It may also be pointed out that India at present is to support not only its own population but also nearly one-fourth of the population of the United Kingdom, approximating to about 12 millions, on a much higher standard of life than the people of India. This is the plain meaning of Lord Rothermere's estimate, which has not been contradicted, that 5 shillings in the pound of the income of every inhabitant of great Britain comes from India.

The advocates of Birth Control in India are not concerned so much with the economic problem as with the hardships of frequent child-bearing by immature wives married at an early age. We have ourselves pointed out that such cases do exist. But adult marriage is the rule among the great majority of the people of India. Child marriages prevail principally among the minority of the well-to-do classes the steady rise in the marriage age of the girls supplemented by the educational influence of the Sarda Act will reduce early marriages among this section of the population. It is well established that the birth rate falls with every additional year in the age of the mother at the child bearing ages. One authority estimated that if in England the age of all women at marriage were advanced by five years, the child-bearing period, and presumably the number of births, will be diminished by 38.3%. This seems to us to be the right solution in the population problem of India, so far as there is one. The propaganda for a universal adoption of contraceptives is injurious, as it diverts attention from the industrial, social and political issues, which are at the root of the question. The Census Superintendent of Bengal puts the objection to this propaganda in a nut-shell. He writes:—"They are repugnant to common sentiments in this country, the methods are so expensive as to be beyond the reach of the great majority of the inhabitants of and it is probably true to say that there are as yet none which can be relied upon as being absolutely certain and satisfactory." We commend the extract from the Bengal Census Report, appended to Chapter I of the Indian Census Report, to the careful perusal of Birth Control enthusiasts. We do not certainly object to the use of contraceptives in individual cases as a means of protecting the mother's health, or even as an economic measure. What we are opposed to is the attempt practically to force the whole population to adopt artificial methods of Birth Control as a normal feature of their lives.

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA—XII.

ANN ARBOR.

Our two days' visit to Ann Arbor was among the pleasantest of our experiences in America. The first thing which strikes one in Ann Arbor is the appropriateness of the name to the place. It is set amidst grass and trees and its streets are glades refreshing to body and spirit. Ann Arbor is virtually a University town. The Michigan University dominates the scene and pervades the atmosphere of the place. We went there at the invitation of Bishop and Mrs. Fisher and the time we spent under their roof was every moment of it rich in experience and instruction. We were met at the railway station by Mr. Halstead who had to leave India where he was a Professor in the Lucknow Christian College, because he received some Congress-minded friends at his home. With him was a slight figure in sarī, Miss Joshi, a Bombay girl who is taking a post graduate course in Agriculture in one of the American Universities. They took us to the Bishop's home where Dr. and Mrs. Fisher gave us a gracious welcome. Bishop Fisher, it will be remembered, retired from India as he found that he could not completely fulfil his duties as a Christian Minister in the conditions by which they are beset in this country. The first visitor soon after our arrival at the Bishop's place was a local journalist. I gave him a short account of my work and a general view of the Indian situation. I added that India was very appreciative of American goodwill but she did not need and did not expect anything more from the American people. When I said that, Dr. Fisher who was standing at a little distance, turned sharply and remarked that it was strange that Gandhiji said the same thing in a letter which he received a few days ago.

Mr. Halstead took us to see a farm near by. It was one of about a hundred acres. It was managed entirely by the owner and his wife with the help of one hired labourer. Practically all the work of cultivation was done by machinery. The farmer had gone out but his wife showed us over the homestead. In addition to raising crops, they bred pigs and poultry. They also reared bees and made honey. Pigs are regarded as unclean beasts in India. It gave me a little shock, therefore, to see the children playing with a little pig as if it were a puppy. When I read the news of the holocaust of four million pigs in a single day as a part of President Roosevelt's National Recovery Plan I thought of the little pig which was pulling at the skirts of the girl in the farm at Ann Arbor. The Moslem prohibition of pig's meat and the Hindu prohibition of cow's flesh, had, perhaps, the same object as the ordered slaughter, but how much more humane! The farmer's wife had heard of Gandhiji and the subject of the removal of untouchability was referred to in connection with his recent fast. The mother did not know who or what the untouchables were, whereupon her little daughter chimed in with: "Mother, they are a class in India with whom others are not allowed to speak." Surprised at this child's information, I asked her how she got to know about it. "We had a talk about this subject in our school last week," she explained. The girl was about eight years of age and the school she attended was an elementary school. It struck me as remarkable that children in an elementary school should be encouraged to think and talk about social conditions in a far distant country which was in no way connected with their own. This is a small incident but it is typical of the American outlook which, even in its most self-centred moods, realizes that there is a world beyond and that it is in some way related to it. Certainly we met more people in America who talked more or less intelligently about world affairs as distinguished from their own, than in any other country we passed through.

As we were taking leave of the family, the farmer's wife put out her hand and asked if I could tell her fortune! I was completely taken aback and so was Halstead. As she seemed to be quite serious, I told her that I did not know and could not tell my own fortune and how could I tell hers!

There were two luncheon parties on the day of our arrival. One was given by the women of Ann Arbor to Kamakoti; the other by Indian students to me. Kamakoti was called upon to speak and spoke, so I heard, for over half an hour, and was heard with appreciation. I also had to speak. I had to speak again to the students of the Summer School that afternoon and later in the drawing room after dinner, for which Mrs. Fisher had a large and very interesting party.

Next morning we walked to a great estate, the property of a wealthy inventor. An extensive area had been laid out as a park. In another part of the estate, there was a large industry comprising cattle breeding and a dairy. There were several cows and some bulls, one of the latter a huge animal said to be the parent and grandparent of many of the younger animals. The Indian cow is a gentle animal with almost human eyes evolved through centuries of human comradeship. There is no sight more interesting in India than the cows returning at dusk from pasture. As they pass along the street each one breaks off at the approach to her house and enters it as if she were a relative or friend of the family. The cow in the West is ungainly in appearance and uncertain in temper.

What impressed us most here was that the son of the millionaire proprietor of the estate, a University student home for the summer holiday, was working on the farm. His sister showed us round, knew every detail about the cattle farm. The pedigree of each of the animals was carefully recorded in a register. We examined one of these books. As we closed the book, Dr. Fisher said, "You see, we maintain a more careful record of the pedigree of our animals than of our human beings!"

We were shown a tall unfinished Bahai temple in Ann Arbor. It is planned on elaborate lines but work has had to be suspended on account of the depression. It seemed probable that the work may be resumed soon. The Temple when finished will be a worthy monument of the zeal of the Bahaites who, it seems, form a considerable group in the United States, as well as an addition to the institutions of Ann Arbor in harmony with its atmosphere of science and religion.

But the most delectable part of the Ann Arbor, was the Fishers' company and conversation. I remember particularly our walk to the Goss estate and the quiet twenty minutes with Dr. Fisher under a sheltering rock above the artificial lotus pool there. He spoke very little of religion but pervading all his remarks on things great and small was the illumination, the charity and the wisdom, the distilled essence of religion. He is one of India's truest friends. But he deprecates extreme professions and is convinced that her cause, in the justice of which he believes wholeheartedly, has most to gain by moderation and strict adherence to truth. Michigan University has about thirty Indian students. This is larger than the number of them at any other American University. This is due to vicinity of the Ford and other factories in Detroit which is one of America's big industrial centres where remunerative work is available during vacation time to students. Notwithstanding the handicap of having to earn their living, Indian students as a class have earned a reputation for intelligence, hard work and excellent conduct. The Michigan University has for several years past offered a scholarship to women of the Orient. A number of girls from India have secured the scholarship and form a golden link between India and America.

Dr. Fisher took me to see his Church. It is a great influence in the life of the University and many students' activities have their centre there. I was also shown the Unitarian Church of which Dr. Sunderland was Minister till recently.

Washington was a little out of the way for us but we could not leave America without seeing its capital city. It is nearer to the Mason-Dixon line separating the northern from the southern states where the colour bar is rigid. Washington itself, we were told, was less free from colour prejudice than New York and Chicago. We did not notice it. At the Willard Hotel we found a lady in a sari coming out as we entered. Kamakoti at once went up to her and found that she was from the Punjab travelling with her husband.

Dr. F. Homer Curtiss, who acted as our guide in Washington, is a most interesting personality. He is a very learned man and the author of many books on the spiritual life. Mrs. Curtiss shared his interests and most of the books bear her name jointly with his. She is now dead but Dr. Curtiss is still, so he assured us, in communication with her and is guided by her advice in all his work. He very kindly took us to his home where he lives alone. Every arrangement in the house suggests the presence of Mrs. Curtiss. When Dr. Curtiss left us for a few minutes I felt as if the lady of the house would walk in to greet us. Dr. Curtiss holds that life and death are not separated but two rooms in the same house. The Curtiss books, says an inscription on the cover of one of them, "dispel the mists from mysticism." Dr. Curtiss is very active and spends a large part of his time travelling about in connection with his mission, driving his own car at a speed, on one occasion of which he told us, at 80 miles an hour. Few young men in India would be able to emulate this veteran in this fact. It was a great advantage to us to have his vast and detailed knowledge of Washington in our peregrinations in that city.

Washington is not in the least like New York or Chicago. It is planned on the lines of an European city. But it is still in the making. Large improvements are being carried out, as a part of the scheme for finding employment for the unemployed, to make Washington the grandest capital in the world. We saw most of the show places. The Senate and the House of Representatives, by comparison with the New Delhi pompousities, are altogether commonplace. They are only now building a suitable building for the Supreme Court. The White House had a swimming pool recently added to it (by subscription from journalists) to enable President Roosevelt to take the only form of exercise which he is able to take. Everything about Washington is workmanlike. There is very little which is merely decorative or intended to impress the populace. A group of cherry trees presented by the Japanese Government as a token of goodwill, is a distinguished feature of the glorious Potomac landscape. The monument of Abraham Lincoln is in its simplicity and nobility intensely moving. The driver of our car remarked as we were discussing what we should see: "You would wish to see your own Embassy, Sir." "Our Embassy!" "The British Embassy. It is the ugliest group of buildings here, but," he added to soften his censure "I admire it as the symbol of the strength and stability of Britain." It is a general belief among Indians in America that when the present Emigration Act was passed the American Government intended to put India on the quota basis like European nations, but that it was dissuaded by the advice of the British Ambassador.

It was late when we returned to our Hotel and I was tired. But they insisted on my speaking at a gathering which had been called. I am afraid that what I said could not have been quite palatable to my friends. British feeling is apt to assume the mask of sympathy with India and Indians in America have to be on guard against it.

A SWADESHI WORKERS' CONFERENCE.

The Secretary of the All India Swadeshi Sangha, writes:—

From the various replies that we have received to the circular recently addressed by us to Swadeshi Sanghas or Buy Indian Leagues in different parts of India, we find that there is a general feeling that some steps should be taken to bring together workers before deciding upon an intensive programme for the propaganda of Swadeshi. The Executive Committee, therefore, propose to convene an informal Conference of the Swadeshi Workers on 28th and 29th December 1933. The following are some of the important subjects which we propose to place before the Conference for consideration:—

(1) Co-ordination in respect of the holding of exhibitions and the laying down of rules for the guidance of promoters of exhibitions.

(2) Examination of the possibilities of the All India Swadeshi Sangha functioning as an All India Swadeshi Certifying Board and the co-ordination of the present arrangements for the issue of certificates obtaining in various provinces, to manufacturers and distributors.

(3) Assistance in the organization of stores for the sale of certified Swadeshi articles and the starting of an All India Swadeshi Store for the purpose of distribution of such articles.

We may add that the All India Swadeshi Sangha is not in a position to spend any money in defraying the travelling expenses of delegates. Nevertheless, we trust that your Sangha League will be in a position to depute at least one or two of your permanent members to attend the Conference and to participate in the deliberation. It is likely that besides the subjects mentioned above there will be in your opinion subjects of all India interest which could be considered at the Conference. If so, will you please communicate your suggestions before the end of this month to enable us to circulate these amongst other Sanghas or the Buy Indian Leagues?

The exact time and place of the holding of the Conference will be announced later.

The attention of the Committee of the All-India Swadeshi Sangha has been drawn to the fact that much inconvenience and confusion is caused owing to the holding of Swadeshi Exhibitions often clashing with one another. The suggestion has been made that as the Central Swadeshi Organization in the country, the All India Swadeshi Sangha should guide the promoters of exhibitions by co-ordinating this form of useful activity and placing its machinery at the disposal of the workers in various centres. Circular letters were addressed by the All India Swadeshi Sangha last year inviting attention to the need of co-ordinating arrangements in respect of the holding of exhibitions, but although a year has elapsed since this action was taken, there has been no progress in developing the arrangements for co-ordination.

It is necessary that the promoters of the exhibitions should intimate their intention to the All India Swadeshi Sangha (Swadeshi Market Kalbadevi, Bombay 2), and the Committee of the Sangha should try to see that there is no clash with regard to the dates of the Exhibitions.

THE CHALLENGE OF JUDGMENT—I. *

(BY RABINDRANATH TAGORE.)

The young generation of men in the East are everywhere attracted by what they imagine is modern. And they have convinced themselves that Western life is modern. They are seeking from its manners and mentality the magic formula of how to grow modern. They believe that what is called modern represents the principle of indefinite growth and freedom, that it is youth, it is life.

If that is the definition of modern, then we must know that its essential element does not consist in a particular time, but in a particular truth, lacking which a thing of the latest pattern and polish may in reality be out of date and condemned to perish. A number of nations have so perished who were too late in realising that the raft of time, to which they clung believing it to be modern, had already become a thing of the past. Are we sure that the same thing has not happened to the West, and that the atmosphere of turmoil which we find there is not due to the conflict between their present history, which is no longer modern, and the messenger of the future, which has come with its sovereign claim?

Even the paling darkness of the dawn is immensely distant from the morning light though they are in immediate contact; and who knows if the present history of the West is not already as old as the day of the deluge!

All that is deeply human is never old. It has the perpetual freshness of imperishable life. Only the acquisitiveness which is not of growth but of hoarding, the cleverness which wins in the game of life with false cards up its sleeve, is crabbled and wrinkled. The business of slave hunting, however up-to-date in form and profitable in practice is old; cannibalism, crude or subtle, direct or indirect, with Christian surname or heathen, is never modern.

How can we ever believe that the spirit of the hungry Nation from the West, which for over a century has robbed and humiliated us in the eastern hemisphere, has found the secret of everlasting life in its reckless power? Have we lost all faith in the teaching of the wise; that the passions which mock the eternal and things that definitely grow out of proportion with their surroundings, can never be lasting?

However that may be, the fact cannot be denied that the outstanding feature of the present age is the way in which the West has spread its physical dominance over the whole world, and is still imposing its mind upon other continents. All the great countries of the East in some period or other of their history, had to submit to foreign invasion and foreign rule, but such alien contact was either milder in its driving force, or was more in harmony with local tradition and environment, and therefore did not attack the inner bonds of unity which maintained the personality of the people.

A complete change of condition has been brought about by the easy means of communication effected by modern science. It is no longer some resourceful individual, who comes like a comet with a host of mercenary soldiers forming his tail, suddenly crossing the path of a strange people and eventually getting entangled and assimilated; but an entire predatory nation which is able to clutch in its titanic grip the vitals of other races for whom it has no feeling of kinship.

Men who do not come as representatives of some organisation, political, commercial or religious, have their simple human sentiments; they are not like ghosts who haunt human habitations and yet do not dwell in them, who obsess living beings and yet do not live their life. Such real individuals naturally tend to establish personal relationships with their neighbours and gradually attain their common unity. But Europe's connection with Asiatic countries has not yet developed that personal character in its organisations, it is like the pressure of some callous outgrowth of her nature, which has not the creative touch of life, but only mechanical skillfulness.

The West has come to us like an engineer who lays stone-paved roads across our meadows and orchards, over our trampled verdure, with the primary object of making easy his work of exploitation. However marvellous and convenient this may be, the overwhelming dominance of mere method and skill in our surroundings is demoralising. It so often makes us forget that, compared to life, the machine is too simple, its action too obvious, its results measurable in an indubitably definite manner, its concentrated influence directed only towards the surface of our nature.

For the same reason we often witness in western countries the demonstration of immense esteem, approaching hero-worship, for some winner in a game of skill or strength. This has increased to such an inordinate degree, that a professional organiser of such games can claim better remuneration than a cultured teacher, even in an educational institution.

The barbarous in us occupies a large place in human nature; it is idolatrous in its instincts, ready to prostrate itself before all representations of power that are external, that compel us to acknowledge them through our greed, or our fear, or our primitive crudity of thought and feeling. In fact the constant sight and contemplation of any success that has colossal magnitude produces the same mentality in us, as in the savage does the fetish, made emphatically apparent by its barbarity of decoration.

However the West, which has thrust itself upon us, is the utilitarian adventurer, imbued with the idolatry of the Nation; it carries an elaborate paraphernalia of self-worship and claims other continents for its victims of sacrifice. The loudest of all the messages that it has brought to ourselves is: 'You are none of us.' For this reason, even its best gifts carry for us an insult, and it is for this very reason that, when we cannot help accepting them, we feel so small. The West has hurt us deeply with the shock of its greatness. Its very magnificence faces us with its stony gesture of refusal.

The moral distance which we impose upon men to whose physical proximity we come for exploitation is immense. This makes them appear so ridiculously diminutive as to be but dimly recognisable by our conscience, it smooths our path of self-seeking to be able to think that others are absolutely other than ourselves, that their human value is represented in coins that have an utterly different mintage from those which we claim for our own. The West, in its relationship with non-western peoples, has for its constant meditation the text—They are radically and eternally different from ourselves. Its cult of separateness, which is the cult of the Nation, bristles with doctrines of disdain. It displays its system of canine teeth in the barbed wire fencing round its inhospitable world in the name of the inborn right to be supercilious, characteristic of a superior civilisation.

Asia in its dignity of age-long tradition, at first refused to acknowledge Europe's claim of superiority. But gradually it had to own defeat at the hands of the organised power and indomitable self-assertion of the Nation, the latest-born progeny of the West. The spectacle of gigantic success with its unsheathed claws and teeth sank deeper and deeper into Eastern consciousness. The contemptuous sneer, which accompanied it rankled in Asia's heart, never allowing it for a moment to remain in forgetfulness of this apparition; till a day has arrived when Asia overcome by the stupendous coil of muscle has gradually yielded itself to the licking tongue of this monster, Organisation of Power.

There has been related in one of our Bengali epics the legend of a merchant who was a devout worshipper of Shiva the God, the pure Shiva who represents the principle of renunciation and the power of self-control. This man was perpetually persecuted by a deity, the fierce Snake-goddess, who in order to divert his allegiance to herself inflicted the endless resources of her malignance upon her victim. Through a series of failures, deaths and disasters he was at last compelled to acknowledge the superior merit of the divinity of frightfulness. The tragedy does not lie in the external fact of the transfer of homage from one shrine to the other, but in the moral defeat implied in the ascribing of a higher value of truth to the goddess of success, the personification of unscrupulous egotism, rather than to the god of moral perfection.

So long as the West herself believed in this latest evolution of her indomitable self-assertion and was certain that it was going to give her an indefinite extension of the monopoly of all earthly privileges, we in Asia also humbly believed in her. The Western people convinced us at the point of their bayonets that they were the chosen people of God, and that the right to inherit the earth was inherent in their race because of a quality which was contrary to that of meekness. We bowed our head to the belief that external success was the ultimate criterion of truth.

At that time it was difficult for Western people to realise that there was anything lacking in their civilisation,—for they were so fatuously prosperous and comfortable, so smugly respectable in their behaviour among their own kinsmen. They were never tired of smiling at themselves and saying that they were good, because their drawing rooms were crowded with irrelevancy, their roads geometrically straight, their minds clever, methods efficient, arrangements convenient; because their women had pet dogs, pet schemes of benevolence and head-dress for which creatures of rare beauty from the most inaccessible regions of the earth had paid toll with their lives.

We, who belong to other continents than theirs, dwell in the obscurity of their shadow, which swallows up our hemisphere, giving us very little chance to bask in the sunshine of their success. For the attitude of success is exclusive, it is by nature suspicious and arrogant. They do not care to come into the heart of our humanity, for it is not needful for their purpose; and they can be exorcuatingly funny when they talk about the peculiarity of the smell of our dwelling places, the inscrutability of our countenances, some mannerisms in our code of behaviour, or any exaggerations in our language or gesture which are different from the exaggerations customary with them. Even after this they become sincerely amazed when their energetic acquaintance with us fails to evoke in our mind a grateful feeling of adoration, or when their victims show signs of unhappiness. These they ascribe either to the machination of some interested third party, or to the incomprehensible idiosyncrasies of the people with whom they deal.

It is because we are so imperfectly real to them that they try to boast of their beneficence by making a long list of the railway lines, telegraph posts, coal mines, tea plantations, and the law and order inflicted upon our lands. Their minds are so densely callous to the needs of our humanity that they are ready to punish us when we do not bless them for what they have done to ourselves, in the way of helping us with commodities which we hardly need and which they vomit forth because they are a great deal more than they can consume themselves.

Let me quote some lines from an article on "Christian Missions", which came to my notice sometime ago:

"The last century has contained instance after instance in the Far East, and in Africa, in which the preaching of the Gospel has seemed to the natives only preliminary to political or economic outrage. Sometimes the two have gone hand in hand."

About the political relations of West and East the writer quotes Tyler Dennet who says:

"No nation has escaped the valid charge of bad faith. The guilt of all parties being clearly proved, it has seemed profitless to continue the discussion of guilt with a view to determining the relative degree of wickedness. Each nation, the United States not excepted, has made its contribution to the welter of evil which now comprises the Far Eastern question."

Speaking of economic exploitation, the same writer observes:

"The ruthless manner in which the ancient handicrafts of India were destroyed to favour the mill-owners of England is a matter of parliamentary record. And the tale of the developing industrial life of India, China, and Africa is being written in blood. Western business demands, and secures all sorts of governmental exemptions and favours to ensure its profits when it goes abroad. And again and again, when there, it follows a policy of inhuman hours and starvation wages that is sowing the wind against the future. It is probable that the West thinks of Sir John Bowring—when it thinks of him at all—as the man who wrote:—

In the Cross of Christ I glory

Towering o'er the wrecks of time.

But the East remembers him as the indefatigable diplomat whose labours contributed so much to the legalisation of the opium traffic in China.

I agree with the author when he says that "this is the sort of international sin that most grievously besets the future—political injustice, economic exploitation, racial discrimination, and material standards of success."

But what to my mind is the source of a greater mischief is the fact that bribery on a prodigious scale is being used to persuade whole people in the East to sell their future. As the opium has shackled the mind of the coming generation of China in fetters of stupor the silver narcotic injected into the people's constitution is creating a chronic national helplessness, including a habit which will make the motherland sell her own children. The bribery which has the sanctimonious appearance of benevolence is the most dangerous form of banditry; for through its unctuous exuberance a huge load of ransom noiselessly drags the country to a bottomless insolvency.

Vivisection Banned in Germany:—A new law for the protection of dumb animals has been promulgated in Germany. It threatens two years' imprisonment or transportation, which causes pain or damage, for anyone found guilty of torturing or mistreating dumb animals and prohibits anyone from compelling an animal to do work beyond its strength. Nor may cats, foxes or other animals be used in training dogs. Vivisection is forbidden in principle, though public institutions or mortuaries, for strictly scientific purposes, are permitted to use live animals if certain hitherto unproven results are likely to be achieved from experiment. Persons not licensed to conduct vivisection are liable to imprisonment up to six months.

IN AN EAST END SETTLEMENT.

(BY SHANTA SUKHTANKER.)

A foggy drizzling evening ushered me into the East End Settlement, which was to be my home for four weeks. The first month of my summer holidays had been spent amidst the splendours of Paris. The previous evening I had strolled down the dazzling avenue of the Champs Elysee and watched the blazing fountains of the Place de La Concorde.

I looked out of the bus window. Fish and chip shops were filled with people and smoke. Wet greasy papers lined the gutters on either side of the road, and grew into little ghostly heaps in front of each chip shop. Knots of men with pale worried faces stood about at street corners. The day had brought no luck, and they still belonged to the unhappy ranks of the unemployed. Children were playing about the pavement, their faces grimy and their shoes full of holes.

The fog grew denser and the drizzle was now an uncomfortable rain. Little did I imagine as I stepped out of the bus into a puddle, that at the end of the month, I should be genuinely sorry to say goodbye to Bethnal Green.

Next morning Settlement life began in earnest. Three hundred children between the ages of 6 and 14 came to be looked over by two nurses before they could be passed for their country holidays. My job was to keep the children in order as they passed from the nurses to the table at which the treasurers were taking in the penny for the nurse and the last little instalment of the sum the parents had been able to contribute towards the child's holiday.

Much labour and planning lay behind this arrangement—forms for each child containing necessary information; laborious investigations and tiresome committee meetings. But what perhaps impressed me most, was the effort made by the organizers to satisfy the children's wishes as to their companions for the holidays. This was no easy task. Jimmy, for instance, would earlier in the week go with no one but Jackie. Today he suddenly announces that nothing will persuade him to go within miles of Jackie. They have had a fight; and he now wants to go with Bob. Bob isn't quite sure if he wants Jimmy. However he dislikes Jackie and agrees to the arrangement. The organizer breathes a sigh of relief—a sigh breathed too soon, for by the afternoon, a truce has been sealed between Jimmy and Jackie, based largely on a fight with Bob. And so it goes on till the day they leave for the country—and they all left with smiling faces. On the Friday morning each one of the Settlement workers pinned on her red C. C. H. F. (Children's Country Holiday Fund) badge, and armed with little piles of tickets, sallied forth with her special charge consisting of from 4 to 35 children, each with an identity card tied round his or her neck. And the day was spent in the tremendous business of conveying the batches from tram to tube-station and from the tube to the station of departure, where the children were locked in, squealing with excitement, in carriages reserved for them. The children were surprisingly orderly—except when they caught sight of a chocolate machine.

Their holidays were to last a fortnight. Meanwhile we were kept busy. Three times a week, there were the morning and afternoon play centres for children who had finished their holidays or who had not been able to go away. At ten o'clock in the morning and two in the afternoon, in they came—about eighty of them—little toddlers with dirty faces, others older and clean but ragged, others prettily dressed by the hands of contriving mothers.

The babies were separated from the rest and provided with woolly toys. The older ones formed two groups. One half played organised games, the other half did sewing or painting or raffia work. In about five minutes the place was resounding with—"Miss-Miss", "Miss I want more paper", "Miss—more brushes", "Look Miss she's spoilt my painting", "Miss Oh—Miss!"

Once a week mostly in the afternoon, there was a Mothers' Meeting—quite an intellectual affair. Books were read and discussed. Sometimes there were speakers. One week I was asked to tell them something about India.

Another evening I went to an "Unemployed Men's Club". I do not think I have ever spent a more delightful evening. One only had to suggest that the present system was not as bad as it might have been and there followed stormy arguments and vigorous reference to "istory" that were nothing less than a treat. When one party could not make the other stop talking, they pointed to me and reminded the opponent that "This 'ere young lady 'as come to 'ear sense". I was agreeably surprised at the interest and knowledge they showed on Indian questions. What seemed to puzzle them most, was "untouchability". "What's the great idea of not touching them?" they asked. "What indeed." I thought to myself. However I tried to explain and also told them about the efforts that were being made to remove what was regarded by all progressively minded people as a social evil. They were pleased to hear that. At the end of the meeting they emphatically agreed that India was "all-right"—whatever that meant. And I was asked to come and see them again at their Occupational Centre for Unemployed men where they did little jobs of woodwork and cobbling. I, of course, accepted the invitation with much pleasure.

The children's holiday fortnight was now over, and we again donned our C. C. H. F. badges and received orders as to the parties we were to bring home.

My first party was to be met at Paddington. The train steamed in. "You can 'ear 'em if you can't see 'em," said a guard with a broad grin on his face, as a babel of voices rose from the centre carriages of the train. Out they poured, with their tickets round their necks, hundreds of them, sunburnt and laughing. Parties were sorted out and we proceeded to the Tube Station. Our progress was slow, for their luggage had been doubled and in some cases trebled. Presents had been brought home for every member of the family. The mother's present consisted usually of a bag of potatoes or apples. Bunches of wild flowers were clutched tightly in little hot hands. Baskets of pet rabbits were very popular. A minor tragedy occurred when a box of live snails collapsed on to the platform, and the owner refused to budge until every snail had been picked up. However, we got home at last, with blisters on our hands, and I thought this had been even jollier than seeing them off.

I still had another ten days in the Settlement, and was sent on visits to various institutions for social work, including one to the Charity Organisation Society, which co-ordinates the various charities and prevents neglect or over-lapping of cases; and one to the juvenile department of a Labour Exchange, conducted by a Juvenile Advisory Committee. I was much impressed especially by the latter.

I cannot resist, however, mentioning the peculiar and unsophisticated friendliness I came across so frequently in the East End. It was sometimes almost startling. One day I was changing library books for a sick ward in a Workhouse, when a little wizened old man came up, and firmly planting his hand on my shoulder said "Do you know—I like you". Almost every time as I stood waiting for a bus, some woman passing by would smile and say "A nice morning, darling." And so it was with real reluctance that I left my newly made acquaintances. My consolation was that a member of the "Unemployed Club" came to the station to see me off.

TRAVANCORE LETTER.

(FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT)

"It is my hope and desire to utilise for the benefit of the State the knowledge and experience that I have gained during my brief sojourn in the West." This is what His Highness the Maharajah said in his reply to the citizens' address presented to him at the public reception at Trivandrum Railway Station on His Highness' return from Europe last August. Since then several schemes of public utility have made remarkable progress. The plan of road improvements which for years had never emerged from the period of incubation is now being put into action, no doubt, as a result of His Highness' observations in the cities of the European Continent and in the United Kingdom. The widening of the road from the Kowdiyar Palace to the Public Offices has been a longfelt want on account of the marvellous and rapid advance in motor traffic in the State, which is equal to a third of the total volume of the motor traffic in the whole of the Madras Presidency. The passenger buses and pleasure cars plying in the direction of the Kowdiyar Palace towards Nedumangad, Shencotta, etc., etc., are so numerous that it is a wonder how the narrow road served its purpose. The improvement carried out has come none too early. The pathways provided on the two sides are conceived with the best idea of urban decoration with the avenue of trees for shade and comfort. The open spaces are to be converted into parks. The fountains put up in the convenient squares are literally an ornament to the town, designed artistically.

AN INDUSTRIAL EPOCH.

The industrialisation of the State is one of the great and working ambitions of His Highness. One of the best means of carrying out this idea was to initiate the Pallivasal Hydro-Electric Scheme. Any one could see in this huge undertaking the hand of one who had something to do with the Pykara Scheme which ushered in an era of plenty and prosperity. But for the statesman and constitutional lawyer, Sir C. P. Ramaswamy Iyer, this Pallivasal scheme would not have been taken up by rigidly conservative Travancore. The bold initiative and courage with which Sir C. P. Ramaswamy Iyer inoculated the timid authorities in the State have been largely responsible for the start the project had. The estimate is for Rs. 70 lakhs, for which ample provision has been found through his unparalleled resourcefulness. It is expected to usher in a new era of industrial progress and prosperity. For Alleppy, the commercial capital of Travancore, will be soon electrified and the industrial centres will be vastly benefited by electric power, which could be brought home to the very door of the villager. Travancore has several cottage industries such as coir making, weaving, etc., and all these will receive a new impetus and stimulus when electric power is made available. In addition to the industrial advancement, agriculture will vastly benefit as large tracts of virgin land could be irrigated under this scheme. The preliminary operations have already been taken in hand and tunnelling work commenced by an expert Russian engineer. The whole scheme is expected to be completed by 1936.

A RUBBER FACTORY.

Another enterprise that has been sanctioned just now is the opening of a rubber factory in Travancore. When Mr. N. K. Padmanabha Pillai, the Director of Industries, was on tour in Northern India, he came in personal contact with a Rubber Factory at Karachi. He then reported to Government that in view of the large quantities of raw material in the shape of rubber in many forms, an estimate of cost may be called for from Mr. J. Helen of Karachi for establishing a rubber factory in Travancore. Government have accepted this proposal of the Director of Industries and Mr. Helen has been invited to Travancore. The idea is to see that such manufactured articles as solid rubber tyres, cycle and car inner tubes, rubber tyres, rubber tubes for the laboratory purposes, rubber matting and rubber coated materials are made here. It is a well known fact that Travancore produces more than two-thirds of the rubber exported from India. The various rubber estates have of late suffered a good deal on account of the unsatisfactory condition of the rubber market in the world. Important developments are expected from this project leading to the establishment of a new industry for the export of manufactured articles. In this connection, it is worthy of note that the area under rubber cultivation in the State during the year 1931-32, was 64,113 acres. According to the export trade statistics of the Alleppy Chamber of Commerce for the quarter ending with September 1933 there seems to be a good demand for rubber as is seen from the fact that 88,824 lbs. of rubber left the shores of the State through the Alleppy port in 1933 when compared to only 15,000 lbs. last year. Ceylon was the only country which indented for Travancore rubber. From these figures, it will be seen that Travancore has forged ahead in an important line of industrial development with far-reaching implications.

THE NEW DEWAN.

The appointment of Sir Mahommed Habibullah as Dewan of Travancore marks an epoch-making event in the history of the State. The post of Dewan has for centuries been held by caste Hindus owing to the peculiar theocratic form of Government under which the Maharaja is only the Dasa or vassal of the tutelary deity of State, Sri Padmanabha Swamy. This ancient and historic tradition was broken by Her Highness the Maharani Regent when for the first time a non-Hindu was appointed Dewan. He was followed by a Brahmin Dewan, but was again succeeded by Mr. T. Austin, I. C. S. Now a Muhammadan has been appointed who will be the first Muslim to fill that high and responsible post. Apart from the good old tradition, it has to be said that the choice is an excellent one on which His Highness the Maharajah should be congratulated. In the present communal conditions of the State no better selection could be made. The association of an ex-member of the Viceroy's Council with the Dewanship of the State is bound to raise its status and position and on that account the selection deserves high praise at a time like this when important constitutional, fiscal and administrative problems are under consideration in the India-to-be.

INDIANS AND SELF-GOVERNMENT.

The Editor,

Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I wish to thank "S.D.N." for courteously pointing out in the Reformer of October 14th an error of which I was guilty, in making the sweeping assertion that there was no one in England who asserted that India would never be fit for self-government.

I mistakenly assumed that it would be understood that my "no-one" referred to all those who "count." The opinion of those in the past or present who do not "count" in this matter, may be regarded as negligible. I should have constructed my sentence as follows:

No one of influential opinion connected with the framing of the new Constitution would assert that India would never be fit for self-government.

Cambridge,
October 30th, 1933.

Yours etc.,
L. J. PITT.

HINDU CHEMISTRY.

The first of a series of the Annamalai University Extension Lectures was delivered by Sir P. C. Ray of Calcutta, in the Inter-Physics Hall, with Rao Bahadur S. E. Ranganathan, M. A., I. E. S., Vice-Chancellor, in the chair. The hall was packed to overflowing. Mrs. Ranganathan, Mrs. Chakravathy, and Mrs. Balakrishna Nair were among those that were present.

The President, in a short speech, extended a cordial welcome to the distinguished scientist and paid a glowing tribute to the spirit of service and youthful enthusiasm evinced by Sir P. C. Ray.

Rising amidst cheers, Sir P. C. Ray thanked the Vice-Chancellor for his cordial welcome. Sir P. C. Ray then spoke on "The Antiquity of Hindu Chemistry." The lecture was illustrated by lantern slides.

He began by saying that there was much truth in the proverb "there is nothing new under the sun." This was amply proved by the recent excavations of Mahenjo Daro. That city had bath rooms with glazed tiles and underground drainage systems which many a modern city cannot boast of. That in ancient India, there have been voteries of the physical sciences could be clearly seen from books in old libraries like the famous manuscript library at Tanjore and in some of the Feudatory States like Alwar, Kashmir, etc. There were also Siddhas or Alchemists. Among the sixteen systems of philosophy, there was one, Rasawara, the science of mercury. There was a disease called Philanroga (syphilis) for which preparations like Rasa Karpura, camphor of mercury were given. Kajjoli or black sulphide of mercury was prescribed as early as the 8th or 9th century A. D. Makaradhuja was prepared by subliming it. In ancient India, such simple operations like distillation and sublimation were much in vogue. They used to distil and sublime mercury and zinc, in retorts and subliming vessels. Partington in his "Everyday Chemistry" has mentioned the Hindu method of sublimation as introduced by the great Buddhist leader Nagarjuna who was considered to be one of the most eminent adepts of chemical science, wherefore he was called Siddha Nagarjuna. The Calcutta University had instituted a prize 12 years ago in his name for the candidate who would furnish the best piece of original work in Chemistry.

The importance attached to experimental evidence would be clearly seen by a perusal of a Sanskrit work on Alchemy called "Rasendra Chintamani" wherein it is written "they are the real teachers who prove by experiment what they teach and they are the real pupils who can reproduce the experiments they learn." Then again in a treatise on "Games and Minerals" the method recommended for the purification of adulterated mercury, or for that matter adulterated products, was distillation, a method which held the field even to-day.

The great physical chemist Arrhenius, Director of the Nobel Institute, Stockholm, who was an authority on the history of chemistry assigned the palm of priority to the Hindus. He accepts that Indian teachings had influenced the Greeks through the medium of Persia. Sir P. C. Ray narrated an interesting story. He published his book on "Hindu Chemistry" in 1902. In 1904, he was deputed by the Government of Bengal to visit the various laboratories of Europe. In the London Chemical Society he came across the German book entitled "The History of Pharmacy". He opened it and found to his surprise elaborate extracts from his own book printed therein, especially, pages about ancient "Hindu Chemistry."

Proceeding, Sir P. C. Ray spoke about Tamil Alchemy also and exhorted those young men to take up the study of Tamil chemistry and get through the works of adepts, and Siddhas and supplement our present knowledge about the subject. In the Tibetan Encyclopaedia we find mention of Indian Alchemical treatises. Many such works were in the manuscript library of Lhasa. Some of them are now with the Asiatic Society of Calcutta, and some are with Dr. Rabindranath Tagore at Santaniketan. Even as arithmetic and algebra had their origin in India, India was also the home of chemical science. That it was zealously pursued in those olden times, that it flourished even during the ascendancy of Buddhism was proved by Nagarjuna's book, Rasa Ratnakara or a Treatise on Mercury. There was a Sanskrit copy of the book in the Kashmir Palace Library wherein a devotee of chemistry praying to the Goddess of Truth says, "for twelve tedious years have I performed austere penance at Thy Feet (vis, practised Alchemy). Do unfold unto me O, Goddess, the precious lore of Alchemy."

There were some metallurgical secrets in the olden days which have indeed died out now. Sir Robert Hadfield visited the iron Pillar near Kutub Minar, in Delhi. This iron pillar has resisted corrosion though made of wrought iron only. It has withstood the onslaughts of moisture carbon-dioxide, oxygen, etc., for centuries together. This is an ample proof of the metallurgical skill of ancient India. But the science was lost to the world for ever. He exhorted the young men present to emulate the noble example of India's greatest scientists so that India may occupy a pre-eminent place in the comity of nations in the field of science also.

AGRICULTURAL RELIEF SCHEME.

The Democratic Swaraj Party has issued the following statement:—Pursuant to a resolution passed at the Session of the All Maharashtra Political Conference on the 29th October 1933, Mr. N. C. Kelkar, President of the Party, has appointed the following Committee: Mr. Jamnadas M. Mehta (Chairman) Bombay, Prof. V. G. Kale, and Messrs. J. S. Karandikar, Poona, Mr. V. R. Kothari, Sholapur, Mr. C. M. Saptarshi, Ahmadnagar, and Messrs. Anandji Haridas, R. R. Bakhale, and S. C. Joshi, Bombay. Mr. V. L. Mehta, Manager, Bombay Provincial Co-operative Bank Ltd., has consented to help the Committee in an advisory capacity in all matters concerning the Co-operative Movement.

The following are the terms of reference:—

1. To examine with special reference to the Bombay Presidency the scheme for the relief of agricultural indebtedness outlined in the speech of Mr. Jamnadas M. Mehta as the Chairman of the Reception Committee of the All Maharashtra Political Conference held on the 28th & 29th October 1933 at Bombay.

2. To suggest alternatives and modifications if any, and

3. To make recommendations.

The following is the relevant extract from Mr. Jamnadas M. Mehta's speech in which the scheme is outlined:—

"The Poverty of the vast masses of India has called aloud for relief during the hundred and seventy five years of British Rule; the misery into which the tillers of the soil have sunk is harrowing in the extreme. They have suffered from the uncertainties of monsoons and harvests with heroic courage, they have borne the crushing burdens of land taxes with a quiet resignation and they have toiled and drudged to meet the calls of usury, have carried the dead weight of an unshakable enormous indebtedness until they have reached the stage of utter economic collapse. I estimate the total indebtedness of the ryot

In this country to be in the neighbourhood 1,200 crores of rupees. This is made up as much of principal as of interest capitalised at the compound rate. The rate of interest has varied from 10% to 15% and often higher. In some cases it is altogether monstrous being hundred per cent for eight months, 150% p. a. The existence of co-operative societies has made but negligible difference. Nothing can help the peasant to return to prosperity while this debt remains in the present form. I have prepared a scheme for relieving agricultural indebtedness which I propose to submit for your consideration tomorrow.

"I am not, therefore, going through its details in this speech. The principle on which the scheme is based is that the State should take over this debt and convert the sowcar's loans into its own at a moderate rate of interest and sinking fund. Any sowcar who can establish a debt due from an agriculturist before a properly constituted authority within a specified period should get bonds for an amount equivalent to his loan. The bonds should have a currency of sixty years and should be issued at four per cent interest. One per cent more should be added to this for the amortisation and the service of the debt and the State should recover this from the peasant as land revenue, so that no separate expense need be incurred for collecting it. While the loan remains unpaid the peasant should not be permitted to alienate his land in favour of a sowcar. This in a nutshell is my scheme. Its details will have to be varied in different parts of the country as local conditions require."

The Conference having considered this scheme passed the following resolution and in pursuance thereof this Committee is appointed :—

Resolved that the outlines of the scheme for relieving agricultural indebtedness envisaged by Jamnadas Mehta in his speech delivered as the Chairman of the Reception Committee of the Conference are accepted in principle and the detailed preparation of a full scheme is hereby referred for consideration and report to a committee.

The Committee is anxious to seek the co-operation of all those who are interested in this question of national importance and will welcome any offer from public bodies as well as individuals of written or oral evidence or statements on the question of agricultural indebtedness and measures necessary for securing a substantial relief for the peasantry from this heavy incubus.

ADULT EDUCATION CLASSES.

The Adult Education Classes, Wilson College, Bombay have commenced their work for the new term (November 20 to February 28) in the last week of November. After the experimental work of four terms during the last two years, this activity has come to have a place in the civic life of Bombay. The Adult Classes claim now about 220 past students enrolled for instruction in different subjects. The co-operation of the members of the staffs of the different colleges in Bombay has been mainly responsible for the success of these classes.

For the fresh term the Adult Education Classes Committee have introduced a few more courses of study. One novel feature is to have more than one course almost every day to meet the demand of the Adult students. All classes meet from 6-30 to 7-30 p. m.

A course of ten lectures will be delivered in each subject and a minimum fee of Rupee one is charged for enrolment. The Committee is prepared to consider the advisability of opening classes for more subjects if there is a sufficient demand.

MAHOMMEDAN WOMEN AND DIVORCE.

Mr. Khalil-uz-Zaman Siddique, Bar-at-Law and member of the Hyderabad Legislative Council, introduced on the 19th instant a new bill in the Hyderabad Council for conferring the right of divorce and separation on married women professing the Mahommedan law, in addition to the circumstances under which they are now entitled to sue for divorce or separation. The Bill is a piece of progressive legislation, in keeping with the times, and seeks to confer on Mahommedan women greater rights than in British India or any other Indian State. The following are the grounds (in addition to those already existing) on which they can claim the right of divorce through a court of law :—

1. If the husband is suffering from an incurable or contagious disease, or from any disease which is protracted for more than one year, or from any ailment under which marital life is rendered impossible.

2. If the disease from which the husband is suffering is such a nature that there is danger to the health of the wife or is calculated to cause her hardship.

Provided in either case that if the wife knew or had reason to know at the time of her marriage that he was suffering from such a disease, she will not be entitled to her dowry.

3. If the whereabouts of the husband are not known, or if, he is sentenced to a long term of imprisonment.

Provided that, if the husband has left sufficient means of existence for her maintenance, the wife shall not be entitled to her right of divorce for a period of four years.

And provided further that in cases in which it is alleged that the whereabouts of the husband are not known, the Court shall record evidence of the husband's relations in support of the allegation.

4. The Court may grant divorce for alleged ill-treatment or cruelty, the husband's refusal to live with his wife or unwillingness or inability to maintain her being regarded as amounting to cruelty.

5. The Bill provides also that the husband may divorce his wife on the ground of her contagious or incurable disease at the time of the marriage, provided he shall pay her nominal dowry.

It is provided that where a marriage has taken place between parties who have not attained their majority, and the persons responsible for such a marriage are other than their fathers and grand-father, such a marriage will not be considered valid until it is ratified and accepted by the parties after they have attained majority.

Where a marriage has been performed by the father or grand-father of a party during the latter's minority, and where the married party claims the right of divorce on attaining majority and where further the Court considers such a marriage injurious to the interests of the petitioner, an order for divorce may be passed; but where the party has attained majority without repudiation of the marriage, such a party will not be entitled to divorce and if the petitioner is the wife, she will forego her claim to any dowry.

It is also provided that where the husband or wife changes his or her religion not bonafide but solely with a view to escape from matrimonial responsibilities, such a conversion will be a ground for granting the relief of divorce.

The mover of the Bill has appended a long statement of objects and reasons for the Bill in the course of which he points out that the rights of the husband or wife are on a par. The Quran provides that a husband should treat his wife well or else divorce her. In the leading case of Mubarak-un-Nisa realpatidar.com Begum vs. Syed Ashram, Nawab Siddique Yar Jung, J. of the Hyderabad High Court, laid down that if divorce is not granted on the ground of cruelty, it would be against the provisions of the Mahomedan Law. And it is for the same reason that the Quazi is empowered to grant separation of the wife from the husband. Mr. Siddique points out that in the case above mentioned Pandit Giri Rao (now Raja Bahadur and a member of the Judicial Committee) sitting as a Sessions Judge had held that, as laid down by Mr. Amir Law in his treatise on Mahomedan Law, the Quazi has the right of granting divorce. On appeal to the High Court the judgment was reversed, but on the wife's appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Babe-Hukumath, Mr. Giri Rao's judgment was upheld. There is judicial authority, therefore for accepting the Bill. The mover of the Bill next refers to the fact that enlightened Mahomedan women have given their whole hearted support to the initiation of such legislation. The All-India Ladies' Conference which has branches all over India, including Hyderabad, has supported the measures, and in the 11th session, which was held in Hyderabad under the presidency of Lady Asman Jah, Abru Begum Saheba has pointed out that the law relating to divorce by Mahomedan women is not in conformity with the religious laws of the earlier times, and that in consequence lakhs of married women are going about without maintenance. The present Bill is in response to a suggestion made at that Conference for such legislation. In consequence of want of legislation the husband has been allowed to deprive his wife of maintenance, as a direct result of which Mahomedan women have been compelled to change their religion and thereby escape domestic tyranny. Mr. Siddique submits that the Bill in no way contravenes the provisions of Islamic injunctions.

AT HITLER'S MOUNTAIN HOME.

Chancellor Hitler has granted me the privilege never before accorded any journalist, of visiting his mountain home in his absence and speaking to the woman he loves best in the world—his sister Agnes, who has played the role of mother to him with unflinching constancy through the years of strife, the woman to whom he speaks on the telephone from wherever he happens to be—Berlin, Hanover, Cologne—every day says Pembroke Stephens, the "Daily Express" special correspondent, in a message to his paper from Berchtesgaden dated October 29.

For a week I have laid siege to the house in the mountains where Storm Troop sentries keep guard night and day, and where faithful servants answer every inquiry: "Madam is not at home." No Minister would give me an introduction to Hitler's sister who has orders from her brother to receive no one in his absence. To-day permission came from the Chancellor, and the fortress fell. Imagine the most beautiful prospect you have ever seen—snow-capped mountains, russet-coloured forests, green plains and hills, and you will understand why Hitler chose the Haus Wachenstein, near the romantically named little Bavarian village of Berchtesgaden, for his home.

Down in the valley, only a dozen miles away, gleams the mighty castle and magic city of Salzburg, Austria—Hitler's native land. His birth place, Braunau, on the border, is just out of view.

Hitler's sister—her name is Frau Raubal—is a tall, stately woman, with a strong, kindly face greying hair and frank blue eyes better-looking than her brother, witty, full of charm. She was dressed in black and wore a Swastika scarfpin, a present from her brother, at her throat. She is two years older than her brother.

"That did not prevent him trying to order me about during our childhood at Braunau," she told me with a twinkle in her eyes. "As a grown-up girl I could not bear to be ordered about by a little boy. We quarrelled and fought nearly all the time. I married in Linz, but my husband was killed at the front. I was left alone with three children" she said with tears in her eyes. "It is terrible to be all alone in life. I think Hitler realised this. He came back from the war safe and sound. At once we were friends. He asked me to go to his favorite Bavarian village of Berchtesgaden, and then I met the early leaders of his movement. It was a dangerous time for the beginners, who went in fear of prosecution, ready to make a dash for it over the border out of harm's way. Hitler asked me if I would keep house with him if he bought Haus Wachenstein which is near Moritz."

"I was very happy. I accepted gladly and here for the past five years my brother and I have made our home. He never talked to me of politics and always wrestled with his defeats and trials alone. Nevertheless, this house represents all Adolf Hitler, the man, has in the world. He has no wife, no children, no hobbies. Two years ago he gave up eating meat. 'I must not poison my nerves with nicotine and alcohol,' he said. Before he gave up meat he used to suffer pain, but he has never been so fit as he is now. When he comes here to rest he lies in bed reading all the morning while thousands of people from all over the country stand waiting in the road outside hour after hour to catch a glimpse of him at the balcony or when he goes out. He arrives here pale and worn out. He lies down for an hour and comes downstairs red in the face and happy, whistling and singing as merrily as a bird. I do not think he will ever marry, but sometimes when he sees pretty blond-headed children—he loves blond hair—he sighs, and says: 'It is a pity I am not married. I should like to have children like that.' At other times he will say: 'I am wedded to politics. No wife would stand for that.' My brother has had no time in his life to think about marriage. First he was young. Then came the war. Since 1918 he has been busy with politics all the time."

A SOCIAL REFORM MARRIAGE.

A notable social reform wedding took place on Tuesday night at Patna. The bridegroom was Sri. Kanhaiya Prasad Verma, brother of Babu Phulan Prasad Verma, Advocate, Patna High Court and the bride was the widowed niece of Mr. D. L. Nandkeolyar Advocate, of the Patna High Court. Both parties occupy high position in the Kayastha Community. The importance of this marriage lay in the fact that it was a three-fold social reform. Babu Phulan Prasad Verma belongs to the Srivastava sub-sect and the bride to the Ambasta sub-section of the Kayasthas. It was, therefore, one of the very few instances of intersub-sect marriages among the Kayasthas. It was a social reform in another sense also because it was possibly the first instance in Behar of a widow re-marriage among the Kayasthas. It was a marriage reform also in the sense that there was no stipulation regarding tilak or dowry. The marriage created such an interest in the Hindu society that not only all leading members of the Kayastha-community (both official and non-official) for example such personages as Mr. Justice Kulwant Sahay, Mr. Sachchidanand Sinha, Rai Bahadur Durga Prasad but also leading members of other castes and communities joined in the marriage procession and attended the ceremony giving their blessing to the married couple. The guests were treated to a sumptuous dinner by Mr. D. L. Nan-

-dkeolyar, the host, who was all attention to them. It may be noted that the bridegroom is a member of the Marriage Reform League, Patna, which has been responsible for many social reform marriages without tilak during the past two or three years.

NILA NAGINI DEVI.

A message from Muttra states that Nila Nagini Devi (Miss Cram Cook) was interviewed by a Press representative in the American Mission House. She said that, she had not made up her mind as to when she would leave the Mission House, but might do so any time. She mentioned that she had an offer from a film company to star in one of the films depicting the Moghul Period.

She said that she had to leave Gandhiji's Ashram, as she could not stand it any longer. One day Gandhiji had stated that he had not put up a fence round the Ashram and any girl who wish to leave the Ashram could do so. She had been approached to return to the Ashram, but she once again wanted to enjoy the thrills of independent life. She said: "I want to hear the orchestra and fly by aeroplane. My mind is all for speed."

As regards her life at the Sabarmati Ashram, Miss Cram-Cook said that difficulty arose because she tried to fulfil her vows literally, as for instance, she slept on a bed of bricks without blankets for months.

She also made the mistake of communicating to Gandhiji every little detail of her life in the Ashram, and her actions which led to complications. She did not wish to be uncharitable to the Ashramites or to Gandhiji. She would rather forget her previous life and revert to her "American freedom."

She did not know how her dreams would be realised again, but felt certain that she would be having thrilling experiences shortly. She did not care what others thought of her and said that the Mission people had done all they could to make her comfortable.

Mrs. Kamaladevi Chattopadhyaya.—The Chief Justice at the Bombay High Court on Tuesday granted a "decree nisi" in favour of Mrs. Kamaladevi Chattopadhyaya on her petition for divorce against Mr. Harindranath Chattopadhyaya. It was further directed that the petitioner's costs would be borne by the respondent. The petitioner's counsel, Mr. G. C. O'Garman, applied for custody of their son aged 10 years. His Lordship said that the "decree nisi" included custody of the child. The petition was uncontested.

NOTES

Birth Control Polemics :—We publish today two letters on our views on the subject of birth control in this country. Mr. G. R. G.'s deals with the question from the population point of view with which the present discussion started. The assumption that there is overpopulation at present or there is likely to be one in the near future, is contradicted by the Census Commissioner of India and even more strongly by the Census Superintendent of Bengal in the passages which we quoted in our leading article last week. Dr. Hutton's view is not that there is overpopulation but that the agricultural industry has too many people depending on it. Relief in this sphere is to be secured by promoting industrial occupation to take off the surplus cultivators. This is one of the issues from which attention is diverted by the present cry for contraceptives. Mr. Venkatrama Sastry's letter lightly passes over this broad issue and lays most stress on the hardship to families of having to bring up more children than they conveniently provide for. His remedy is to reduce the number of children. Others demand that there should be a more equitable distribution of wealth. We have the greatest respect for Mr. Sastry. From the point of view he takes he is doubtless right. But there are larger considerations involved which we are sure Mr. Sastry will admit. The main difference between Mr. Sastry and ourselves, however, is in our conception of the family. He regards it as an economic entity like a joint stock company although on even this ground his arguments are not wholly tenable. A joint stock company can be wound up when it ceases to pay dividends though many such companies go on working in the hope that better time may come. The family is really a social and, if we may say so, a spiritual unit which cannot be regulated by the law of demand and supply.

If no one should have a child unless he is able to balance his budget, millions in this and other countries be doomed to a childless existence. We can at once think of at least half a dozen of eminent Indians whose parents were never able to balance their budgets during their lifetime. Others who could have balanced several scores of budgets besides their own, have had to go to their graves without the children their hearts yearned for. According to the economic school, the rich man should have most children, and the poor man few if any. Demography, however, follows a different law. Even if a man had a dozen children we have never known him welcome the death of five of them as he should if the economic structure of the family is the chief thing that mattered. Mr. Sastry too readily assumes that the paradox of starvation amidst plenty which we see around us, is a natural and unchangeable condition. Children with hands to work will not have to be content for all time with the sight of food which makes their mouths water. They will use their hands to take it, if society does not stir itself betimes to bring about a rational distribution of the necessities of life.

Change of Governors :—The relinquishment of office by a retiring governor and its assumption by a new one, was not so very long ago a notable event in Bombay, and excited considerable public interest. Little interest, however, is now felt and the public views with indifference these transitional phases in the administration. The reason seems to be that the public have lost faith in the capacity of governors to do anything which has any bearing upon their every-day life. It must also be said that there have been few great governors for a long time past and that the gentlemen sent out as such have had no previous record worth consideration in their own country. The real work of a governor is done through his Council, and, therefore, it often happens that he is best known by his Ministers. An able minister reflects credit on his chief, while the choice of a third-rate man, with no previous record of public service, has a contrary result.

A German Minister's Explanation :—The German Minister of Interior, has issued a statement with the object of allaying the apprehensions expressed in the Japanese and Indian press regarding the implications of certain recent legislative proposals bearing on the future association of Germans and Asiatic races. He points out that people of other races can now as formerly still earn their living in Germany. German schools, he further mentions, are still open to foreign students. It appears from Dr. Fricke's statement that the chief restriction which may be introduced will relate to inter-marriages. Germany desires to ensure purity of blood in her people and, without disparaging other races and civilizations, intends to prevent the dilution of German blood. Dr. Fricke invokes the similar tendency among other nations, especially those of Asia, in defence of this policy. Inter-communal marriages have been always repugnant to Indian social polity founded on caste. The hero of the Mahabharat war gives the confusion of races which would result from the carnage on both sides as his main reason for refusing to fight with his kindred. The Hindu caste system is based on the principle of race purity and other races and religions in this country have also adopted it in practice. If Germany thinks an adaptation of the caste system is the true remedy for her trouble at the present day, it does not lie in our mouth to condemn her policy. We do not think that there is any considerable section or class in this country who would regard a German bann on inter-marriages as a national grievance though having regard to the insignificant number of such inter-marriages, they may feel it an unprovoked slur on their race and religion.

U. S. A. and Asiatic Immigration:—The Free Press Journal published on Wednesday the recent ruling of the United States Department of Labour on a point of great importance to Indian students. Many of our students in America used to earn the money needed to maintain themselves by working during their spare time. This was prohibited by the post-war Emigration and Labour laws and some Indian students were deported for engaging in remunerative occupations. This rule is not now strictly enforced and some Indian students are still supporting themselves by part time work in factories and in households, mainly owing to the sympathetic attitude of Universities' authorities. But so long as the ruling was not changed, such students were liable at any moment to be deported from the country. The question has been pressed on the attention of the Roosevelt Government which is in close contact with University opinion. The Labour Department has issued a new ruling which virtually restores the freedom which students in the United States enjoyed in the pre-war period. The same issue of the Free Press Journal publishes the news that the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce has approved the extension of the quota system to Asiatic peoples. The strongest opposition to Asiatic immigration came from California and, therefore, the action of the San Francisco Chamber has a special significance.

An Industrial Anomaly:—The Indian Witness, an American Missionary organ, has some pertinent comments on the negotiations now taking place about the import of cotton piece goods. "That India should be importing such large quantities of cotton goods and at the same time exporting raw cotton," it observes, "indicates that something is wrong somewhere. America has raw cotton for sale but we have not heard that America imports raw cotton. (India imports raw cotton from Egypt and latterly from America since the fall in the value of the dollar.) She is ready to sell what is not needed. The same should be true in India. The most logical market for Indian raw cotton is India and those interested should give their attention to this phase of the problem and there will be some hope that a solution will be found." An even more pertinent question is, why should India go on producing a much larger quantity of cotton than she can herself use? America is giving a bonus to cultivators for curtailing the cultivation of cotton, in order to raise prices. But India goes on over-producing this commodity in the interests of other countries, and to her own detriment. We are indeed a peculiar people. We do exactly what no one else does and apparently for that reason. All other countries jealously conserve their gold. We freely export them. Others devalue their currency; we keep ours at an abnormal level at a great sacrifice. Others raise their tariffs to protect their industries. We lower them to enable the industries of other countries to prosper!

Cow Dung Cure for Cholera:—Science has found that cow dung possesses the power of eating up disease germs. In a paper read at the Malabar Medical Association, for a summary of which we are indebted to the Hindu, Lt. Col. Webb, Director of Public Health in Madras, reported that success had attended the experiment of using 'phages' derived from cow dung as a preventive against cholera. His attention was attracted to this remedy by noticing that, in spite of deliveries taking place in some of the squalid and dirty quarters of several poor Indians (which are almost universally smeared over with fresh cow-dung every day) and the use of cow-dung as an external application of wounds and inflammations, several cases were found to be improving without any rise in temperature. Dr. Ashashroff investigated and found that cow-dung contained bacteriophages. Thus another India 'superstition' is seen to have sound reason behind it. It was proved many years ago that the water of the Ganges river, held in reverence by Hindus, had also the property of destroying bacilli. There is, says Bacon, a superstition in avoiding superstitions. We have lost much by indulging in this superior kind of superstition, instead of investigating old practices and modifying them to suit new conditions.

BOMBAY, DECEMBER 9, 1933.

ANARCHISM A HINDU MOVEMENT.

We published in the Reformer of 18th November the speech which the Governor of Bengal made at the Armistice dinner at Calcutta. Sir John Anderson said in that speech that he 'amused' himself by trying to discover the difference between War in its normal sense and the War which his Government was waging against anarchism in Bengal. His Excellency found that the main difference was that while in the former case you knew who the enemy was, in the latter you were unable to distinguish between friend and foe. Speaking at the St. Andrews' dinner at Calcutta three weeks later Sir John Anderson definitely declared that the anarchist movement was a Hindu movement. He allowed that some Hindus were not anarchists but these were apparently the exceptions which justified his grand generalizations. This declaration has created much resentment and some severe criticisms have been passed on it. The Tribune of Lahore takes it to be a reflection on the Hindu religion. This, of course, would be absurd. The other day an Afghan youth shot King Nadir Shah, and political murders are not unknown in Christian countries. The Prime Minister of Buddhist Japan was killed sometime ago. No religion has proved to be a prophylactic against political distemper. Sir John Anderson probably knows nothing and cares less for Hinduism. But he must be surely aware of the broad facts of history. The anarchist movement is a Hindu movement only in the sense in which nearly all the reactions to modern thought—good, bad and indifferent—in this country, whether in religion, social life, industry, arts or politics, are and have to be Hindu. The Himalayan Hindu mass is exposed to the first impact in all their fury of outside forces before these pass on to other communities much modulated by the impact against the mighty barrier. Understood in this sense—and it is the only sense in which it is intelligible—there is nothing for Hindus to resent in Sir John's characterisation of anarchism in Bengal as a Hindu movement. At the same time, a sweeping generalisation of the kind by a person in Sir John Anderson's position, is bound to affect the way in which Hindus and Britishers regard each other not only in but far outside Bengal. It is also calculated to cast distrust on the impartiality of Sir John Anderson's Government in questions concerning Hindus: For instance, the Secretary of State's reply to a question in the House of Commons about the abduction of Hindu girls, that the Government of Bengal did not take a serious view of the matter.

In his Armistice speech, Sir John gave the impression that his measures had not succeeded so far. In a rather flamboyant peroration, he told his audience that if they brought to this local conflict the qualities which carried them to victory in the great war, the issue could not possibly be in doubt. At the St. Andrews' banquet, he assured his hearers that the anarchist movement had been controlled. A few days before the opening of negotiations with the Irish leaders, Mr. Lloyd George declared at a Guildhall banquet: "We have murder by the throat." Nevertheless, the Coalition Cabinet decided upon a settlement with the Irish by negotiation because the alternative, in the words of Mr. Winston Churchill, then a Minister, in his "World Crisis," was: "In order to paralyse the activities of a few thousand persons the entire population must when required be made to account for every hour of their time." Sir John Anderson notwithstanding that he claimed to have anarchism under control, wanted more power. The movements of the Hindu population in Midnapore and Chittagong are already rigorously restricted and the demand for more powers is evidently made in order to restrict them still more. The task from which the Coalition Government shrunk in the case of Ireland, His Excellency is apparently determined to carry out in the affected districts. Fourteen years ago the uncontrolled acts of the Governor of the Punjab led to a political conflagration which extended to the whole country. Sir John Anderson's methods, instead of circumscribing the limits of the trouble in Bengal, are calculated to drag the whole country into a turmoil. "The issue," His Excellency said, "could not possibly be in doubt." That also is our conviction. Anarchism is a state of unstable equilibrium. It must die of itself even if it is not quelled by extreme measures involving the whole population. The statesman should beware that, in dealing with a local and ephemeral phase, his words and acts do not sow the seeds of a wide and permanent ill feeling between two peoples. The Irish settlement has failed to appease the bitterness which the events which preceded it created in Irish minds. "It would have been possible in 1883," Mr. Churchill sadly observes, "to have reached a solution on a basis infinitely less perilous both to Ireland and to Great Britain than that to which we were ultimately drawn." If the Governor of Bengal is too preoccupied with his own immediate problem to think of the larger bearings of his words and measures, it is for those above him to see that they do not impinge on weightier matters. As for the Hindus, they have survived far more powerful onslaughts in the past, and are not likely to succumb to Sir John Anderson's fulmination. We are surprised at this outburst for last year Sir John Anderson, as one heard from reliable sources, was the only Governor who took strong exception to the communal bias of present-day policy.

realpatidar OUR TRIP TO AMERICA—XIII

THE OTHER HALF NEW YORK.

From Washington to New York is a four-hour journey by the express trains, of which there are several. We took a train at about 8 o'clock in the morning and were in New York at 12-30 the same day. Miss Hattie Bagansky and Mr. William Bridge received us at the station and took us to the Hotel "New Yorker" where they had arranged rooms for us. We were on the thirty-seventh floor, from which the streets below dwindled into small dimensions. Right opposite my window towered the Empire State Building, said to be the tallest building in the world. A special feature in this hotel was that in every room we had, in addition to the usual equipment, a switch at a turn of which we could hear the radio programmes of half the world. If one had nothing else to do, one could while away the whole day from morning to midnight by turning on the radio to the different stations. The management was exceedingly efficient and obliging and responded to every call made on them by us with promptitude.

Miss Bagansky was in charge of the New York headquarters of Mr. Das Gupta's organisation. He had spoken to us of her as a gem of a girl. She certainly deserved the compliment. She was an expert stenographer, drove a car with great skill amidst the crowded New York traffic, had a fine head for figures, was in touch with every group in New York interested in India and was a born New Yorker. She is Polish by origin—some of her relatives to whom we were introduced can only speak the Polish language—and intensely proud of her motherland. It is not too much to say that during the four crowded days that we spent in New York this time, we were greatly helped by her kind attention.

Mr. William Bridge is also one of Mr. Das Gupta's colleagues in his many international activities. He is a quiet, cultured man who keeps himself in the background as much as possible while all the time he is doing something or other to promote good will among nations and races, which is the great object of his life. We are indebted to him too for many good offices during our stay in New York.

A letter was awaiting us at the hotel from Dr. Sunderland, fixing the next day for our visit to him at Poughkeepsie. His son, Prof. Sunderland of Michigan University, met us at Ann Arbor, and wrote to his father apprising him of our desire to visit him before leaving America. Dr. Sunderland lives for the greater part of the year with his son at Ann Arbor, and spends three or four months with his friends, Mr. and Mrs. Bolton, at Poughkeepsie. We left the next morning by train and reached Poughkeepsie at about noon. Dr. Sunderland himself (he is 93 years old) with Mr. and Mrs. Bolton was on the platform to receive us.

Poughkeepsie was beflagged for President Roosevelt whose home, Hyde Park, is nearby and whose private office was just opposite the hotel where we were. Dr. Sunderland's guests for luncheon. The President had visited Poughkeepsie the previous day and hence the decorations. At the hotel, I had to make a statement to the representative of one of the local newspapers. There are three newspapers in this small town, and he told me that they were going to have a fourth one soon. Every town in America, large and small, has its local newspapers, at least two of them. My statement to the Poughkeepsie paper was reproduced in the Reformer of September 16. We had to go to Mount Kisco, some 50 or 60 miles from Poughkeepsie, in the afternoon, and the Boltons had kindly offered to take us there in their car. When Mrs. Bolton brought round the car for us to leave, I turned to bid good-bye to Dr. Sunderland, scarcely expecting him to undertake this long drive in a hot summer day. But he shook his head and said that he was also going with us! Throughout, he was quite alert and active, pointing out to us the various noteworthy places along the road. One of these, just near Poughkeepsie, is the Vassar College, the famous college for women in America. It has a large library where Dr. Sunderland every day at a new book which he is writing. I had met Dr. Sunderland in Bombay several years ago, and I have a group photograph in which he is the central figure taken at the Prarthana Samaj. But I had then no opportunity to speak to him at any length.

Dr. Sunderland told me at Poughkeepsie how he came to be interested in India. He said he first visited India many years ago with the ordinary outlook of a Christian Missionary but when he met Indian leaders and came to know India at first hand his opinions changed and he became, what he has always and consistently been since, the most ardent and outspoken champion of India in the United States. His famous book, "India in Bondage", has gone through three editions and he had distributed at his own expense copies of it to all the libraries in America and several in Europe. Dr. Sunderland has never met Mahatma Gandhi. He has a profound regard for him. He gave me a message to Gandhiji, which I take this means of conveying to him, wishing him all success in his noble work for the regeneration of India.

Mount Kisco is beautifully situated on the river Hudson. Our rendezvous was an old house, once George Washington's country house, now leased for an international centre by Kedarnath Das Gupta and his friends. Mr. Bridge lives here and he has nearly always staying with him visitors of almost every nationality under the sun. Conspicuous among these at the time of our visit was a Russian Professor of Moscow University, a man of wide culture and vigorous personality. There was a gathering of about a hundred people and they were all delighted to see Dr. Sunderland with us. As we were having tea some one mentioned that Kamakoti had been to prison twice in connection with the Civil Disobedience movement. Dr. Sunderland who was sitting at a little distance from her, at once took off his hat and extended his hand to her saying: "Let me have the privilege of shaking you by the hand." Kamakoti was deeply moved but managed to say she felt this to be a great moment in her life. I could say nothing.

There were speeches, the principal topic being the Fellowship of Faiths. It was at this gathering that, speaking after me, the Moscow Professor acknowledged that the Soviet policy relating to religion had no application to the Hinduistic outlook with its stress upon attitude of mind and not upon dogma. Dr. Sunderland spoke a few words, in which he commended the Modern Review and the Indian Social Reformer as weighty exponents of Indian opinion, which deserved to be widely read in America. He left after a couple of hours with Mr. and Mrs. Bolton for Poughkeepsie. In all human probability we shall not meet again in this life. The few hours that I spent with him were a great inspiration. There are few men who feel for India and who have done so much for her as Dr. Sunderland. I was greatly impressed and encouraged by his noble example of work even at his great age. It is a rebuke to those of us who seek to shirk the duties and responsibilities of life on the plea that they are getting on in years. In many ways, we regard and cherish our visit to Dr. Sunder-land as the crowning incident of our trip to America.

Miss Bagansky drove us in her car to a near-by railway station from where we reached New York late in the evening.

The ambition to build tall buildings has been present in the minds of conquerors and kings from ancient times. The Tower of Babel was intended as a refuge to human beings at any later deluge. It could not be completed, not because of the confusion of tongues among its builders but because they had not the mechanical equipment to proceed higher than a few hundred feet. Hindu kings erected solid pillars in granite or iron to commemorate their victories. Mahommedan rulers of India improved upon this and built towers for the same purpose. The Kutab Minar in Delhi is the most famous of these. The Kutab Minar really is a hollow pillar with a winding staircase inside. There is no other use for it except to impress those who see it with its height and symmetry. The Kutab Minar, however, is only 150 feet high and only young and energetic people can make the complete ascent at a stretch. The Empire State Building in New York is more than a thousand feet in height and has 102 stories. The ascent is made by means of three shifts of elevators, one covering about 50 stories, the other about 30, and the last the remaining 20. On the top-most story is an observatory commanding a very wide horizon. All the other floors are filled with offices and shops. The building illuminated at night is very imposing. The initiative in raising this stupendous structure as a symbol of the supremacy of the New York State was taken by Mr. Al Smith, who was a candidate for the Presidency against President Hoover. Mr. Smith was born in very lowly circumstances and in an autobiographical article which I read in one of the American magazines, he wrote that his education was chiefly in the streets of New York. He has risen to be one of the powerful figures in America by dint of energy and ability. His own office is in the Empire State Building. He seems to be a universal favourite and every one is proud of him.

One of the shops which we visited in New York this time, makes a specialty of collecting butterflies from all parts of the world and utilises their wings in jewellery of all kinds. The man in charge had a beatific vision of India as "a God-given land" and expressed great reverence for Gandhiji but he did not seem to realise that his butterfly business was fundamentally opposed to the Gandhian gospel of Ahimsa.

I had promised Dr. Finley, the Editor of the New York Times, to give a statement for publication on the conclusion of my visit to America. I called at the Times office and Dr. Finley promptly handed me over to his chief news editor. The statement duly appeared in that paper and was reproduced in the Reformer.

There are three Indian restaurants in New York. To one of these Miss Bagansky took us for dinner one evening. All that I can say about the place is that it is a very praiseworthy effort to give the Americans some idea of Indian culinary preparations.

I sat up late at night on the day previous to our departure listening on the radio to the speeches made at the Pacific Nations Conference, which began its sittings on the 14th August. Among the speakers was my Chinese friend, Dr. Hu Suih, who concluded a vigorous address by pleading that the world should be made safe for humanity. He was followed by the Japanese representative, if I remember aright the eminent statesman Viscount Ishii, whose speech struck a very high note, and who, in effect, declared that Japan was striving not only for her own advantage but for the good of humanity. The speech of the British delegate, Sir Herbert Samuel, was also impressive. I particularly remember his peroration. "Let us go out" he said, "under the skies and behold the stars. Who can go to war after looking at a star?" It was nearly midnight when the speeches ended. I waited a few minutes after twelve and went to Kamakoti's room to express my greetings on her birthday. She was writing farewell letters to her friends. We were both touched at the thought of a birthday greeting so far away from India.

This was the last day of our stay in New York and it was crowded with engagements. The Rev. Walter Foley and his wife had invited us to their residence in Long Island but owing to the distance and the short time at our disposal, I requested them instead to be our guests, and they were good enough to come. Dr. Foley was in India not long ago and he had written occasionally in the Indian Social Reformer. His views are always characterised by great breadth and liberality, and we were delighted to see him and his wife before we left America.

The centres of Sanskrit culture established by Mr. J. C. Chatterjee in Europe and America, are free from the mystical associations of some other Indian cultural propaganda. Its membership consists largely of scholars. The head of the New York centre is Mrs. Othilie Bergner who had kindly invited us to have our last meals in America with her. There were besides our hostess, Dr. (Miss) Ella Leidheuser and Dr. Fred J. Neveling, all Germans to their finger-tips. They were keen students of Indian philosophy and culture, arts and crafts. We were much interested in hearing their views on recent events in Germany. They defended the Hitler regime with vehemence. "We are Germans first and Americans afterwards." They told me that several German families settled in America for generations, still spoke German as their mother-tongue. They were passionately devoted to the German language. For India and Indians they had a very warm corner in their hearts. They accompanied us to the North German Lloyd boat, the "Bremen" and stayed with us till a late hour. Mrs. Bergner took me to the Captain and spoke to him in German, which she explained to me to mean that he should be particularly regardful of our comfort, otherwise she would report him to the President of the Company whom she knew well! Whether due to this threat or not, they were very attentive to our wants in the boat, and on the last day the chief steward suggested that I should write a letter to the captain.

The only German I had met before was Prof. G. Oppert, Professor of Sanskrit at the Madras Presidency College, where I studied a few months in the Matriculation class. He was a most phlegmatic man in the literal sense of the term. And the impression I had then formed of Germans as a phlegmatic people was completely removed when I met this group in New York. We have never met more vivacious people. An hour before the ship sailed our cabin steward entered with a seven foot cardboard box addressed to Miss K. Natarajan. It was sent from a florist and contained a beautiful vase and a fine assortment of flowers which kept their freshness right through our voyage to Italy. There we consigned them to the sea. The vase remains with us as a precious memento of our visit.

I received a telephone message in the morning from one of the radio stations that I was to broadcast for about fifteen minutes that evening at 7-15 on the National Recovery Plan. I told Miss Bagnasky to inform the people that I was much pressed for time and moreover had only a very general idea of the subject. The reply was that it was all arranged from Chicago and that it would cause considerable dislocation to their arrangements if I did not keep the engagement at the stated hour. It occurred to me that as this would be my last function in America it would be a good opportunity for me to make my farewell acknowledgments to our friends for their kindness to us and their goodwill towards India. From the Bragner's dinner we went to the radio office five minutes before the appointed time. Someone else was at the microphone inside. Punctually at 7-15 I was rushed into the room and set before a clocklike machine at one table. There was a similar one at the other table at which Mr. Bridge took his seat and introduced me briefly to the invisible audience. The moment he left I had to begin. I said that when I came to America I had doubts about democracy but what had happened there had done much to remove them. A democracy cannot formulate policies. It can only choose men to guide its destinies and when it chooses the right man it has justified itself. I had heard many friends in America say that, although they had voted against Roosevelt at the Presidential elections, they now regarded him as the one man equal to the duties of the Presidentship at the present crisis. I had not studied the National Recovery Plan in detail but the underlying principle of it, namely that America should first get her own house in order before she could undertake to help the world, was a sound common sense one which if followed in every country would go far to ensure the peace of the world. I added a word of warning that there were bound to be setbacks in such a vast undertaking and against the tendency to make the President solely responsible for its success as unless the whole country supported him his best efforts will not prove adequate. I concluded by conveying our grateful appreciation of the hospitality shown to us in America. When I emerged from the radio sanctum they all told me that my speech was just what it should be both as regards time and substance.

BIRTH-CONTROL.

I

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In your issue of November 18, it was properly contended that the cause of India's over-population is the low standard of living of the masses, for a low standard of living restricts the masses' choice of occupation in leisure hours with the result that purely sexual pleasures, being the cheapest, are over-indulged in and an excessive number of children are born. (This state of affairs is not peculiar to India and may be seen in any European slum or poor peasant region.) As a possible solution of the problem a growing body of responsible men and women are advocating the extensive teaching of contraceptive methods (witness the great public interest shown recently in Madras Presidency) while a perhaps equally responsible body of opinion objects to this proposed remedy as attacking the effect and not the cause, and demands that the masses' standard of living be raised, not their families reduced, at the same time with seeming paradoxicalness declaring that a higher standard of living would automatically reduce the population. When we get down to practical action, how is the standard of living of the masses to be raised, bearing in mind the restricted resources available today in public and private purses? Surely the widespread use of contraceptive methods would itself assist to raise the standard of living, for a smaller family means that there is more to go round for each member of it, which in turn means better hygienic and educational opportunities. The two things are reciprocal; smaller families bring a higher standard of living and birth control will enable the masses to produce smaller families, while a higher standard of living tends to reduce the size of families, as the history of the European upper classes conclusively shows. And in India, at any rate, there is no immediate fear that the country will become under-populated for many generations.

A final point: certain groups of people maintain that the use of contraceptives lowers the moral tone of the user and they thus condemn it on social grounds. Is there, however, any evidence that immorality and crime are commoner among the upper classes, among whom birth control is fairly frequent, than among the slum dwellers, where contraceptives are almost unknown? Those who object to birth control on religious grounds cannot be argued with; faith is not subject to reason.

II.

The Editor,

Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

You have touched on this topic in your issues of the 21st October, 4th and 11th November. I understand you to object to Birth Control as it diverts the attention of the public and the State from the primary duty of providing work for all and improving the economic condition of the country. I hope I have understood you aright in thus summarising your view. If I am right, is it not like saying that a man who balances his budget and lives within his means is doing wrong as that diverts his attention from improving his economic condition? For the State as for the individual it is not impossible to make all efforts to improve the condition of the individuals in their charge and at the same time calculate the amount of burden they can properly bear in their own interests, individual and collective.

You maintain in the true Henry Georgiyn style that every new birth is not only a mouth to feed but an additional pair of hands to work. We can starve on plenty as we now know to our cost. The pair of hands may only add to the number of unemployed and the mouth that waters at the very sight of food may not be able to reach it. With all the goodwill of individuals and of States, there is just now no certain advantage from indiscriminate addition to pairs of hands.

In any case can it be maintained that there are limits to the endurance of the ills of too frequent maternity and to the bringing up in efficiency of many children and yet there should be no limits to procreation and the greater the population the better it is for the State? It is only a calculation of advantage in the event of war, which we shall only make certain by over population and clamour for space in other lands. We should not hesitate to act in our own interests because foreigners in their interests may also commend it to us.

You say "If birth rate is appreciably lowered, the death rate remaining what it is, the Indian population will soon be on its way to extinction." That is pure arithmetic but the assumption is wrong. The death rate cannot remain. You cannot say that a family which had twelve births of which five died would have had the same number of deaths if the births had been only seven. All might have survived and in any case five would not have died. "If the death rate remained"—is a wrong assumption.

It is said that birth control is impossible for the lower classes. No one denies difficulties. People who are out to secure perfect self-control and are willing to do patient work for achieving their ends and are not prepared to recognise anything as a serious difficulty or impossibility—why do they plead that this is impossible and not to be worked for?

THE CHALLENGE OF JUDGMENT—II

(BY RABINDRANATH TAGORE)

We have seen in the late War that moral camouflage creates a useful delusion not only in the minds of the opponents but in those of one's own party, and for the same reason a vast ethical department is necessary as an adjunct to the organisation of exploitation. For the hand that draws blood is greatly helped if it is guided by the idea that it is translating some Sunday School lesson in a beautiful practice. In olden times there were tribes of men who thrived upon other people's possessions. Not having that sense of decency which wears a protective decoration they used very little material or moral clothing. They are described in history as savage tribes with criminal tendencies. They remained isolated; no respectable peoples copied their manners. Such narrowness of seclusion itself made their mischievous power short-lived and restricted it to a small area.

In modern times they have changed their names and methods, and even while a great portion of the world is being ripped open by the iron claws of their organisation they have no hesitation in believing in the sure foundation of their civilisation and the perfection of its superstructure. It produces such a moral confusion that even we, who are their victims, are willing to copy them.

In fact, we are beginning to be ashamed of our trust in what we call dharma, the sovereignty of the inner world of ideals. We think that it is a sign of the possession of some brand-new type of cleverness, shinningly up-to-date to be able to join in the chorus of cynical laughter at a faith in the reality of moral truth.

So we watched for long the outer horizon and there saw no portent of storm-clouds overtaking the fair weather in the West; in fact, all our meteorological misgivings pointed their arrow-heads to the thunder-bearing forces from the West carrying menace in other directions. We had been witnessing far too long the triumph in human history of the law of natural selection prevalent in the biological world, the elbowing out of the less offensive by the aggressive pressure of a superior noxiousness. All our calculations came to be based upon the working of that law, till, at last, the man in us made his final obeisance to the brute in us and uttered in awe, Hail, unholy Might.

While such a hymn of praise was being raised in all the countries of the world, both by the victors and the vanquished, while the races favoured by fortune dreamt of nothing else but the sharpening of their military fangs and the lengthening of their commercial suckers; while the defeated peoples were cherishing the hope, and secretly preparing to be able one day to contribute their own share of devilry to the political nightmare of the modern cult of nationalism; the most devastating war that ever happened tore into tatters the enormous self-satisfaction of Europe. She has lately been startled into realising that its origin was not from outside.

Up to this moment she had been at the zenith of her power and brilliancy; to outward seeming she had conquered endless time for her boundless prosperity, while she had been moulding with a pitiless success the destiny of millions of alien people to fashion her own footstool and kept it permanently secure. The barometer which recorded the external condition of the atmosphere foreboded a perpetual monotony of fair weather. There had been, no doubt, angry flashes of lightning from the friction created by colliding greeds, but it was firmly believed that the promptings of intelligent self-interest were in themselves sufficient to check any of these violent gestures from ending in a catastrophe.

Then came the day when everything that had given her supremacy in the world seemed to turn against her and the science which she had tamed for a hunting expedition tore ugly rents in her own limbs, which still show no sign of healing. So her proud mind has had to come to the conclusion that her present suffering is not due to any lack of intellectual attainment or material advantage, but to some cancerous growth within her own moral nature.

This has, at length, given us in Asia the opportunity of judging Europe with our mind freed from the hypnotism of success,—an opportunity necessary for our own salvation. This judgment must not be in a spirit of retaliation, which chuckles at the chance of hurling back at the West some part of the evil-smelling mud which she was never tired of flinging at the unprotected Orient. Nevertheless we must have the courage to judge. For the standard of moral judgment is the true helm of our life. Lately it has been laughed at by the modern young person for being stationary, and our hold upon it has been slackened. We must regain our confidence in it, knowing that this helm is more necessary for us to-day than ever before, because we are overtaken by a current that is sudden and swift, by winds that are changing, and because we must move among breakers.

Fight there must be in this world. We cannot make truce with impunity. Our evolution towards the perfect has been and has to be through a series of fights. Our moral judgment is the best weapon we have in the warfare for the preservation of humanity. With it we have to resist and even to hurt, for the cause of justice.

Have we not noticed in the modern East how the people who have a highly developed instinct for turning out things of perfect beauty for their daily life show utter crudity in their selection of Western articles for show or for use? They completely forget the dignity of the true born aristocracy which they possess in the world of craftsmanship when they try to acquire or imitate the furniture and other Western appliances that bear the brand of the outcast. They carelessly allow the aggressive weeds into their garden where flowers had been nourished by the love and the sensitive understanding of generations of their forefathers. It has been made possible because they have blindly surrendered their judgment of excellence overwhelmed by the spectacle of robust success. In their infatuation they rob Apollo of his homage in order to offer it to the image of Hercules.

My heart was filled with shame and pain when I passed by the ruined mounds of the Summer Palace of Pekin, brought to the dust by those who were furiously loud in their condemnation of the destruction of some ancient cathedrals of Europe by their enemies. Yet they can be forgiven for they know not what they had been doing. They merely personated an unintelligent storm of fury which had a scientific thoroughness of brutality, and they want only destroyed buildings, pictures and objects of art the like of which was never seen before nor will be in the future.

But it fills my heart with despair when I realise that the modern Chinese are themselves helping in the devastation of the genius of China, daily growing used to things of creative touch which their fingers have acquired. It shows an apathy which is uncivilised. True civilisation knows the value of things that belong to the higher nature of man and is ever ready to take trouble to produce them, use them, and maintain them in their excellence. To succumb to the temptation of cheap production is the sign of the shallow mind that seeks its release from the strenuous claim of high aspiration in the vulgar comfort of standardised respectability. The educated China of to-day seems to have surrendered its judgment of taste and through this defeat is threatened with a desert of white monotony swallowing up the colours and features of its civilisation.

The surrender of moral judgment is also a defeat through which the invasion of the West is laying its stony road across the soul of the East, leading most of its traffic of ideas to the gambling-den of commerce and politics, to the furious competition of suicide in the arena of military lunacy. Shady paths that ran into various avenues of life carrying the call of co-operation, are one by one being closed. This also is helping the monotonous extension of that aspect of the West which is not fruit-bearing.

But we must not allow this to go on. We must find our voice to be able to say to the West; "You may force your things into our homes, you may obstruct our prospects of life,—but we judge you. You may ignore our judgment. Materially it will not injure you, nor check you in your climbing up the dizzy precipice of profit and power, but it will save us from moral degradation. We refuse to humiliate ourselves by saying that you are worthy of obedience because you are strong, worthy of respect because you are rich."

What I have discussed above only shows that in its relation to the Eastern peoples the aspect of Western character which has come uppermost is not only insulting to us but to the West itself. Nothing could have been more unfortunate in the history of man than this. For all meetings of men should reveal some great truth which is worthy of a permanent memorial such as, for instance, had been the case of India's meeting with China in ancient times.

At the moment when the West came to our door, the whole of Asia was asleep, the darkness of night had fallen over her life. Her lights were dim, her voice mute. She had stored up in her vaults her treasure, no longer growing. She had her wisdom shut in her books. She was not producing living thoughts or fresh forms of beauty. She was not moving forward but endlessly revolving round her past. She was not ready to receive the West in all her majesty of soul.

The best in us attracts the best in others; our weakness attracts violence to our neighbourhood, as thinness in the air attracts a storm. To remain in the fulness of our manifestation is our duty not only for ourselves but for others. We have not been great in the West because we have failed to bring out the greatness that we have in us and we delude ourselves into thinking that we can hide this deficiency behind borrowed feathers.

Yet through all our shame and our suffering, we have to acknowledge that the West is great. With her science she has offered a grand illumination to the path of reason. Some people in the East are in the habit of reviling science, calling it materialistic. They may as well say that incendiarism is in the fire. Science is truth. It is immaterial. It gives us freedom in the realm of matter. It brings our mind into touch with the eternal at the uttermost brink of the finite. What if science can help some temperaments to cultivate materialism—cannot religion do the same? We have witnessed in the East the grossest form of materialism and the cruellest form of inhumanity stalking abroad in our society wearing the uniform of spiritual culture. We constantly see the episcureanism of religious emotion, indulged in by self-centred individuals, admired by simple-minded people as piety in full blossom.

On the other hand, the usual form of spiritual expression we find in the lives of the best individuals in Western countries is their love of humanity, their spirit working through their character, their keen intellect and their indomitable will leaguely together for human welfare. In their individuals it reveals itself in loyalty to the cause of truth for which so many of them are ready to suffer martyrdom, often standing heroically alone against some fury of their national insanity.

When their wide human interest, which is intellectual, takes a moral direction it grows into a fulness of intelligent service of man that can ignore all geographical limits and racial habits of tradition. The goodness which is undaunted in chivalrous adventure, and love of truth, variedly active and widespread in its ministrations, we do not see in the East.

But because in their individual lives the Western peoples have raised the tower of their moral standard so high, the ravage of their national unrighteousness at the base is fraught with dangerous consequence. Bespattering the whole world with their diplomatic lies, continually adding to the number of victims for their man-eating prosperity, scientifically crushing the human rights of large continents of races, spreading a contagion of ugly carbuncles all over the earth with the impurity of their utilitarian touch, keeping their snarling nastiness bared at the entrance of their miserly national mansion,—they have, in all these, an ever increasing gravitational pull against the top to their greatness. The fall will be terrific.

But what is most unfortunate for us in Asia is the fact that the advent of the West into our continent has been accompanied not only by science, which is truth and therefore welcome, but by an impious use of truth for the violent purpose of self-seeking which converts it into a disruptive force. It is producing in the countries with which it is in contact a diseased mentality that refuses moral ideals, considering them to be unworthy of those who aspire to be rulers of men, and who must furiously cultivate their fitness to survive. That such a philosophy of survival, fit for the world of tigers, cannot but bring a fatal catastrophe in the human world they do not see. They become violently angry at those who protest against it, fearing that such a protest might weaken in them the animal that should be allowed to survive for eternity.

Doctors know that the infusion of animal blood into human veins does not give vigour to man but produces death, and the intrusion of the animal into humanity will never be for its survival. But faith in man is weakening even in the East, for we have seen that scientific power has enabled the inhuman to prosper, the machine to rule in the place of Dharma. Therefore in order to save us from the anarchy of weak faith we must stand up to-day and judge the West.

But we must guard against antipathy that produces blindness. We must not disable ourselves from receiving truth. For the West has appeared before the present day world not only with her dynamite of passion and cargo of things but with her gift of truth. Until we fully accept it in a right spirit we shall never even discover what is true in our own civilization and make it generously fruitful by offering it to the world. The culture and the humanity of the West do not belong to the Nation but to the people.

While nations fight for their exclusive possessions the peoples share with one another their true wealth. And the highest spirit of the peoples of the West, their loyal love of truth and active love of man, we must try to make our own in order to impart to our life a movement and to our ideals a vitality that shall give them the impulse to produce new flower and fruit.

IF I WERE TWENTY AGAIN.—I *

(By J. T. SUNDERLAND.)

In regarding the question before us, it takes only a very little thinking to make several things clear.

One is that none of us can go back and become twenty again, when once we have passed that very inspiring time in human life. There are no eddies of backward currents in the stream of time. We may pray never so persistently,

"Backward, turn backward, O Time in thy flight, Make me a child again just for to-night," but the fight of time is only onward.

A second thing that is clear is, that if we could go back to our past, unless we could have greater wisdom than we had then, or be differently circumstanced (in which case it would hardly be our past), we probably should not do very differently from what we did. So that it would be idle to wish to have a chance to try life over again, unless we could do it with the help of greater wisdom or better advantages.

Still a third thing grows clear. There probably isn't one of us who has passed on beyond youth who has not found life bringing to him gifts which he would not, on any consideration, consent to surrender, even for the privilege of going back and being young again. Where is the father or mother who would give up his or her children? Where is the true husband or wife who would give up the other, the dearer self? Where is the man or woman who does not have friendships which have grown and deepened and taken on added sacredness with the years, until they could of no condition be parted with?

All this helps us to see that youth does not possess all the good there is in life, or all these attractiveness. Youth has its own charm, as the spring has. And it is a very rare charm. But one would not want the year to be all spring. It is better that summer and autumn and winter should come in their place. Each brings its own great wealth of good, and its own satisfactions.

The truth is, the glory of life lies in the full roundness of it—in going through all the rich and precious experiences of every season of life, from the earliest spring-time to the latest autumn—from the light-hearted childhood in the nursery as life's morning sun begins to climb the eastern sky, to peaceful old age by the fireside, as life's evening sun sinks in the west.

With this much by way of introduction, to prevent misunderstanding, let me come to the question that is before me, "If I were twenty again, what would I do?" Let me suppose it possible to go back to that age, and begin life again at the point with my present knowledge and experience. How would I shape my life? In what respects would I do differently from what I have done? What rules or principles of life would I adopt?

Of course these are large questions which can only be imperfectly answered. But perhaps we may be able to get some thoughts on the subject not wholly without value. Let me speak first of one thing that I would not do.

If I were twenty again, I would not be in a hurry. Perhaps there is no time in life when one is more likely to feel in haste than at twenty. Youth is gone; manhood and womanhood are upon us. We begin to feel stirring within us strange new powers and ambitions. We grow eager to get out into the world—to plunge into its battles, to work out careers for ourselves. We begin to feel old. I doubt if I have ever felt so old, since, as I did at twenty or twenty-one. I now see how very young I was.

The reason why I would not be in a hurry if I were twenty again, is, that that independent, responsible life upon which one is soon to enter, is so large, so many-sided, so serious a thing, that one needs the largest and best possible preparation for it—a preparation much larger and deeper and more thorough than anyone can possibly get who rushes into it in haste.

It so happens that some of the greatest and most momentous decisions in life have to be made soon after one sets out upon an independent career.

One of these is the business or calling in life that one is to follow. It is immensely important that he shall choose that business or calling wisely. Success or failure is likely to hang upon the decision. It is plain then that in so serious a matter there should be no undue haste. In the case of some young persons, the choice of a calling seems to make itself—if I may use the expression. That is to say, the young person very early develops a decided taste for some calling, or shows a strong aptitude in a certain direction, which is nature's way of pointing out to him what he can do best. In some respects young persons are fortunate who are born with such a natural bent or taste or aptitude. They are saved the anxiety and risk of making a choice of a calling for themselves.

But in many, perhaps a majority of cases, young people are not aided to a choice of a vocation by any such clear and decided indication in themselves. They have to canvas the whole field of calling open, study their own nature as best they can, study the nature and the possibilities of the various callings, and thus decide between them. It is not an easy matter. In many cases it is exceedingly difficult. A false step taken in haste or ignorance may prove a life-long disaster.

Hence the importance of waiting before taking the step, until one has some maturity of judgment, and some knowledge of himself and the world. Here comes in the value of the years spent in schools. What is a course of high school study? What is a course of college study? Each is a voyage of discovery, made with two distinct objects in view. One object is, that the student may discover nature—I mean, find out all possible about the world he lives in; the other is that he may discover himself—I mean, find out and develop as fully as possible his own faculties and powers. Now when a young man has made honestly and earnestly one or both of these voyages of discovery, and thus found out what they have to reveal to him about himself, the world, and human life, do you not see how much better prepared he is to make intelligently and wisely such a great decision as that of what his career or work in life shall be?

But a choice of a vocation is not the only one that he has to make. Other decisions almost as important follow. Shall he marry? If so, whom shall he marry? No decisions can be more serious than these. How great is the need of wisdom, maturity of judgment, knowledge of human nature, knowledge of one's self, in order to make them safely?

Nor yet may we stop. Launching out upon independent life not only means decisions to be made as to one's calling, and concerning marriage and the home, but much else. Life's many-sided responsibilities at once confront him. He must take his independent place in the community. He must assume the duties of citizenship. He must become a member of the social order, and adjust his life accordingly. If he is to be a business man, will he set his standard of business high, and hence do something to maintain a standard of honour and integrity in business circles around him? In society will he be an integer, or a cypher? Will he become a factor in the community for the elevation of its intellectual and social life? Or will he simply drift with the tide? As to religion, what will he do? Will he support and help it, or will he be an indifferent? Or, will he sneer at and oppose it? And if he supports religion, will he support a kind that is most enlightened, most elevating, and best, or a kind that is allied with ignorance and that tyrannizes over the human mind?

These are some of the questions of grave import, both to himself and to society, which crowd upon a young man when he launches out upon independent life. He must meet them and in some fashion settle them. Shall he settle them wisely, or foolishly?

You see how great is the need of intelligence. You see how serious a matter it is for him to hurry into life before he has the intellectual furnishing of knowledge and judgment to enable him to settle them properly. You see the need of that discipline of mind and that knowledge of the world, of human nature and of himself, which the school and the college are calculated to give. You see why I said that if I were at twenty, with my present experience, I would not be in a hurry to get into the work and responsibilities of life, until I was as well as possible prepared.

If I were twenty again, while setting out to give my intellect the best training possible, I would not neglect those other kinds of training that are equally important, namely, taining of the will, the conscience, and the heart.

As to the will, I would discipline myself to the making of prompt decisions, and clear and strong resolves, not to be shaken.

As to conscience, I would say, it shall be my king. What it clearly commands, that I am to obey without question. Integrity, even in the smallest things, is to be the inviolable rule of my life.

As to the heart, I would set out to keep all its holy fountains of love and sympathy open, that their waters may make green the waste places of life, for myself and all with whom I have to do.

If I were twenty I would look out very carefully what habits I formed.

Habits are like a statue that an artist moulds in clay. While it is fresh it is plastic: he can change it as he pleases. Let it stand a while and it hardens, and changes become very difficult. In early life it is comparatively easy to correct bad habits, or to form good ones. The young person who is wise will look very carefully to the habits which he allows to fasten themselves upon him.

If I were twenty, I would set out to keep clean lips and a clean heart, as not less important than a clean face or clean clothing. I would try to provide myself always with pure air to breathe. But at the same time I would try to remember that it is quite as necessary to have the moral atmosphere one breathes sweet and wholesome, as to have the physical atmosphere so. I would as much shun the moral poison of unworthy companionships, as I would the physical poison of malarial swamps and pest-houses.

If I were twenty again what would I read?

I would not be narrow in my reading, and yet I would not read indiscriminately, and certainly I would try to exercise some common sense in my reading. Is there anything more amazing than to see men and women all around us who would not think of eating and drinking everything they saw, wholesome or unwholesome, fit to be eaten or filthy, yet reading absolutely everything that comes in their way, no matter how worthless or how debasing it may be? If I were twenty again and didn't have a vein of idiocy or lunacy running through me, I don't believe I would do that. I don't believe I would fill my mind with the weak and worthless and often wicked stuff that offers itself to us in so many of the popular books of the time, especially the novels, and in our great daily papers. If I thought my stomach too good to be filled with trash I think I would regard my head as too good to be similarly filled. Of course I do not mean that I would discard all newspaper reading, but I do mean that I would try to read only the best, and I would limit myself. I would no more allow myself to read habitually the sensational records of scandal and gossip and vice and crime and prize-fights that crowd and blacken the pages of some of our great dailies, than I would allow myself habitually to drink from a sewer.

Beyond a limited amount of periodical reading, I would be a reader of books, I do not know that I would absolutely adopt Emerson's rule to read no book until it is a year old; but I would not read books merely because Mrs. Grundy was talking about them. Above all, I would read great books. My motto should be few books and noble. I would choose a few great minds—the greatest—and these I would know as I know my nearest friend. If I were to select three books out from among all the rest in the world, they should be the Bible, Shakespeare and Emerson; the Bible as the world's greatest book of religion, and the book woven into all our civilization as no other is; Shakespeare as an epitome of the whole world in one glorious volume; and Emerson as the greatest seer and illuminator of life that God has given to our modern times. To be at home in these three books is to possess the best culture known to man.

THE BENGAL GOVERNOR ON THE WAR PATH.

Speaking at St. Andrew's Day Dinner, His Excellency the Governor of Bengal disagreed with those who held that methods adopted for dealing with terrorism had demonstrably failed. The general position with regard to terrorism to-day, as compared with a year ago, showed a very decided improvement. There had been a marked reduction in the number of outrages and in quite a number of cases there had been a most welcome disposition on the part of the public to join forces with the Government in rounding up those believed to be culprits.

He was convinced that steady pressure rather than any spectacular demonstration of force was the true remedy and the process of eradication inevitably would be gradual. Experience showed that the law might still have to be strengthened in certain respects. That matter was in hand. Desperate characters undoubtedly were still at large in various parts of the province but the Government meant to go steadily on without relaxing the pressure until the movement was definitely and finally brought under control. "I believe we have got its measure."

His Excellency added that the terrorist movement was essentially a Hindu movement although that did not mean that the whole Hindu community should be stigmatised. The reason why it had made so strong an appeal to a limited section of the Hindus was perhaps the general atmosphere favourable to the propagation of subversive doctrines. Opinions might differ, but personally His Excellency thought part of the reason was to be found in the gloomy tinge that the outlook, both political and economic, was apt to assume by Hindu intelligentsia. For the development of democratic institutions wherein they avowed their faith, the Hindus could not hope as a minority community in Bengal to maintain intact the privileged position which in the past they undoubtedly enjoyed under British rule. His Excellency, however, felt that under the new constitutional arrangements Hindus would not and could not be deprived of opportunity of taking their part and pulling their weight in the public affairs of the country except in so far as they might themselves spurn that opportunity. In his judgment, therefore, their political outlook was not as black as it was sometimes painted.

Referring to the economic outlook His Excellency said hitherto it had been the Hindu who was most seriously affected by the problem of middle-class unemployment but as his community advanced the Moslem would be more and more concerned. It was no condonation of aims or methods of the terrorist to say that it was little wonder that many young people fell an easy prey to his insidious propaganda. That, in His Excellency's opinion, was the crux of the problem. Solution would not brook delay. The province was not poor either in natural resources or in manpower but there must be some maladjustment somewhere in the system which kept the vast agricultural population groaning under the load of debt eking out a penurious existence and yet in most districts lacking useful occupation nearly for nine months out of twelve. The Government was convinced of the necessity of making a sustained effort to solve the problem of reorganisation of the rural economy of the province. They were satisfied that in that direction only did the salvation lie. It was on agriculture, Bengal's staple industry, that they must concentrate. As a first step to facilitate co-operation between the Government and outside opinion a Board of Economic Enquiry would forthwith be set up in order to deal effectively with the problem of existing indebtedness and to attempt to build up for the future a sound system of agricultural finance.

Proposing the toast of the "Viceroy and the land we live in" His Excellency observed, if his predecessors had made a mistake of deserting Calcutta for Delhi. His Excellency was doing his best to repair the error, and he knew Calcutta would always be glad to give him a royal welcome.

CHOLERA AND COWDUNG.

A special meeting of the Malabar Medical Association was held at the Paran Hall, Calicut when Lieut-Col. J. R. D. Webb, Director of Public Health, delivered a lecture on "Bacteriophage" writes the correspondent of the Hindu.

It was in 1927 when he attended the Far Eastern Association of Tropical Medicine Congress held at Calcutta that he had the opportunity of learning something about the Phages, and about the importance of the use of Bacteriophage specially in cases of dysentery. When the speaker went to England in 1931, he had the opportunity of meeting Dr. Ashashroff on board the ship when the latter was found to claim all kinds of things for phages. He wanted the question of immunity to be seriously investigated as it was a marvel to him that in spite of deliveries taking place in some of the squalid and dirty quarters of several poor Indians and the use of cowdung as an external application for wounds and inflammations several cases were found to be improving without any rise in temperature. Dr. Ashashroff investigated and found that cowdung contained Bacteriophages. Dr. Ashashroff went to France and there he was joined by an Indian doctor and his wife (who also happened to be a doctor) and they were able to separate three strains of phages which they called "A, B and C."

When the speaker returned to India in July 1931, and joined duty at Madras he had a talk with Major King, Director of the King's Institute, Guindy, and they decided to try the efficacy of phages on a mass scale during important festivals in the presidency. When a patient recovered from cholera he developed phages in his body. Cholera Bacteriophages passed from individuals to individuals. Dr. Pandit of Madras demonstrated at Guindy the effect of Cholera-vibrio and phages mixed together. They were able to prepare different strains of phages as "A, B, C, D, E, and F." These phages were put in 20 cubic centimetre bottles which were fit for use for a period of three months. This concentrated phages were mixed with water and used for drinking purposes. During the last festival at Godavari, there was cholera infection in the neighbouring place of Bhadrachallam where a smaller festival was going on. To prevent the spread of cholera at Godavari festival, the Public Health authorities put phages in wells, barrels and other vessels in which water was stored for drinking purposes. They were astonished to find that there was no case of cholera during that festival. Soeptics and statisticians attributed it to accident. At Rajahmundry they drank only water heavily dosed with phages. Again there was no cholera. The statisticians once again said that it so happened sometimes.

In December 1932, Major King and the speaker attended the Research Workers' Conference at Calcutta. There was a battle royal between the two parties, one party demanding the closing down of the phage enquiry and the other appealing to continue the very useful and humanitarian work. Those in favour of the Phage Enquiry won the day. Under the auspices of the Research Association Dr. Ashashroff in Patna, Col. Morrison in Assam and Col. King in Madras, continued the work. Dr. Pandit from the King Institute, Guindy, was sent to Patna for training for a month before the Kumbakonam festival. Before the commencement of the festival at Kumbakonam all water sources were heavily dosed with phages. They had also fitted up a field laboratory at Kumbakonam for testing the efficacy of phages. Any case of suspected real cholera or diarrhoea was tested to ascertain whether it was a true case of cholera. There was not a single case of genuine cholera. At a third festival in Kistna in July 1933 phages were again introduced. Just before the festival, cholera was prevalent in East Godavari and West Godavari. It was then thought that cholera was sure to effect the festival at Kistna. It was surprising to note that there was not a single case of cholera throughout the festival. In North Arcot District the use of phages was tested in a municipality with controlled cases and it was found that there was no cholera cases among the people who used water into which phages were mixed and there were cholera cases where phages were not introduced in the municipal area.

As a curative agent this was introduced in the Infectious Hospital, Madras, with very good results. Col. Morrison from Assam also reported the same results.

In conclusion the speaker said that so far the use of phages have been proved successful as a preventive measure and as a curative the presumptive evidence was so far good. He appealed to the doctors present to try this experiment either in specified localities or in alternate cases keeping a correct record of results.

GERMANY AND ASIATICS.*

Dr. Frick, Minister of the Interior, in a statement to Reuter's correspondent, in view of the anxiety created in some Eastern countries by the plans of the German Government in regard to the racial question, said —

"On behalf of the German Government, I declare that there is no foundation whatever for the fears expressed in the Japanese and Indian Press that Germany intends to 'de-class' members of foreign races and to treat them differently from members of the German race.

"The National Socialists' racial legislation is based on the idea that the maintenance of racial purity is of decisive importance for the future of the German people. A similar tendency has also been noticed amongst other nations, especially those of Asia.

"In Germany, the Jewish race is the strongest among the foreign races. Although the numerical share of the Jewish population in Germany is only 1.5 per cent., in the last decade, specially since 1918, by the influx of Jews from the Near East, it has gained enormous influence in the economic, financial, cultural and political spheres.

"To give two examples. I may recall," said the Minister, "that the number of Jewish lawyers in Prussia alone was 3,515, out of a total of 11,814, namely, 29.8 per cent. Amongst public notaries, there were 1,945 Jews, out of a total of 6,226, namely, 31.2 per cent. Still greater was this influence in all German Universities, where Jewish teachers numbered on an average 30 per cent. of the total. In the medical colleges of the Universities of Berlin and Breslau, they even numbered 45 per cent. To put a check on this excessive alien influence had become a question of life and death for the German people, so that this racial legislation represents only an act of self-defence and not of hate.

"In addition, it is the aim of the German Government to foster the racial qualities of the German people and assure their purity. Government, by their efforts in this respect, have no idea of trying to pronounce judgment on the quality of other races. They are absolutely conscious of the fact that many races, which are different from the German race, represent old and high civilisations. The German people and Government have not the slightest intention of disparaging those races.

* Reuter's Message from Berlin dated December 6.

"In this connection, I should particularly like to point out that members of an alien race can now, as formerly, still earn a living in Germany and that German schools are still open to their youth.

"It cannot cause a surprise in view of the importance of the racial question for the German peoples of the future and the passionate interest of the population in this question that the suggestions and wishes regarding legislation on an entire social problem, amongst others, the question of mixed marriages, have been submitted from all sides to the Government. If this has led to alarming rumours abroad about the German racial legislation, either mistaken or deliberate distortions of facts have been made, or existing regulations have either been falsely interpreted or mere suggestions distorted from the real meaning have been represented either as definite or as imminent facts."

FOREIGN STUDENTS AND ASIATICS IN U. S. A.

The most recent ruling of the Department of Labour affecting "gainful labour" by "bona fide" foreign students is that, if he has some means but not sufficient income to cover necessary expenses he will be permitted to accept sufficient employment to meet necessary expenses. A student having no means will also be permitted to work to earn sufficient funds to pay necessary expenses. But in no case will a student be allowed to accept employment of a nature to interfere with his full course of studies.

A "bona fide" student is defined as follows: (1) an alien at least 15 years of age who presents a valid, non-quota immigration visa duly issued by an American consular officer and designating the alien as a student; (2) who is qualified to enter and has definitely arranged to enter an accredited school, college, or university particularly designated by him and approved by the Secretary of Labour; (3) who seeks to enter the United States temporarily for the purpose of pursuing a definite course of study in such institution and will carry a full course of studies in day classes; and (4) who intends to depart voluntarily from the United States upon the completion of such course of study or upon failure to maintain the status of student.

The San Francisco Chamber of Commerce endorses the extension of the quota system to Asian peoples. It approves the removal of the present discriminatory and provocative rule of Asian exclusion established by the United States immigration law. This enlightened policy of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce is also endorsed by the California Council of Pacific Relations, which is carrying on a vigorous campaign of public education. It is pointed out that if Japan, India, China or any other country adopted the policy of American exclusion, the American people would certainly resent it.

Under the proposed quota, it is felt, the practical objects of Asian exclusion would be accomplished. This is made obvious in the fact that under the quota only 185 Japanese, 105 Chinese, and not over 50 Indians would be admissible annually. Indeed, the "San Francisco Chronicle" asserts that fewer Japanese would have entered the country under the quota rule than have entered since the adoption of the unfortunate exclusion law of 1924.

The "Chicago Daily Tribune" says that objections to the admission of Japan and China to the quota system is not based on practical considerations, and ought not to prevail against the considerations which support the quota principle. "The substantial interest both economic and social, which exclusion protests cannot be inquired by the adoption of the quota, whereas a reasonable cause of offence to the Japanese and Chinese would be removed. That it should be removed as soon as possible is in the interest of the Pacific Coast as of the rest of the country."

Vivekananda Society School:—The new building of the school run by the Vivekananda Society, Colombo, was declared open by the Hon. Mr. F. G. Tyrrell, the Officer Administering the Government, in November writes the Hindu Organ. Mr. Tyrrell cut the floral festoon which was drawn across the entrance and declaring the building open entered it followed by the large gathering of members and guests present. Mr. A. Mahadeva, President of the Society, after extending a welcome to the Acting Governor said that the Vivekananda Society had before them the high ideals the Swami preached in his lifetime, and if they might even achieve a small fraction of those ideals they would feel deeply thankful that they had done so. The membership of the Society began with about fifty and today they had 1,400 on the roll, drawn from the professional classes, the Government service and the mercantile community. They purchased a centrally located property as the home of the Society and opened a school for those children who attended no school whatever. They had at the start 50 children and two teachers, and the number was now 350 children with seven teachers. The school received recognition from the Department of Education and was now earning a Government grant. Through the generosity of the Hindu public they were able to erect the new buildings which would serve the needs of the school more efficiently.

Roosevelt Denounces Lynching:—A strong condemnation of lynching was made by President Roosevelt in a broadcast address to the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America. He described the recent cases of lynching as a vile form of collective murder, called the lynch law. He added: "We cannot excuse those in high or low places, who condone such practices."

NOTES

Impressions of Japan:—Sir Lallubhai Samaldas visited Japan in the middle of this year and has published his impressions of that country and its people in a neatly printed volume (Taraporevala, Sons & Co.). The author has exceptional qualifications as an observer and interpreter of conditions in a foreign country. He combines in himself the experience of a scholar, administrator and businessman—not an ordinary combination. The very first thing that struck him in Japan, and that is the impression which is conveyed by the very first sentence, is the cleanliness of the people. Sir Lallubhai paid particular attention to the position of women and to industrial conditions in Japan. He is of opinion that Japanese women exercise less influence on public life in that country than Indian women do here. Facilities for higher education for them are few. There is no purdah, but, says Sir Lallubhai, "the wives do not mix with their husbands' male friends and as a result the husbands and their friends, when they want to have a good time of it or when they want to entertain guests, invite them to a Japanese restaurant where geisha girls act not only as waitresses but as entertainers." Sir Lallubhai, however, formed a very high opinion of the charm of Japanese women. Speaking of religion Sir Lallubhai confirms the general belief in this country that the religion of modern Japan is nationalism. He emphasises the absolute identity of mind between the Japanese Government and the people as the mainspring of the wonderful progress of that country. Sir Lallubhai gives an interesting account of the research hospital at Beppu near which are some hot springs. He himself underwent a day's treatment for which he paid only one yen, about fourteen annas. He calculates that he would have had to pay nearly fourteen rupees in Bombay for similar treatment. The book is enlivened with excellent pictures. That of the author at Kagen Falls is a very fine portrait. Facts for Birth Controllers:—Economists who advocate birth control by artificial methods as a remedy for overpopulation by reducing the birth-rate, should take note of the experience of Soviet Russia. Notwithstanding the State encouragement of birth control propaganda and the legalisation of abortion, the population continues to increase at a rate exceeding the Indian rate which has frightened them so much. So writes Fannina Halle, an excellent English translation of whose very interesting book "Women in Soviet Russia" has just been published: "Nowhere in the world do you see so many pregnant women as in Moscow, in Soviet Russia, in the whole Soviet Union; nowhere are there so many children. The annual increase of the population is estimated at three and a half millions. Before long a sixth of the earth will be mainly peopled by those who first saw the light in the land of the revolution." The object of the Soviet Government is to improve the quality of the population and birth control is one of the means to this end, the other being measures for the protection of motherhood and childhood which is officially declared to be "the path to the new socialist 'byt' (life)." A Russian Laboratory is said to be perfecting a cheap contraceptive, more efficacious than any yet devised, from buttermilk. This is a book which should be read by students of social science as it gives a vivid account of the far-reaching social reconstruction, which Soviet leaders have taken on hand and of which the outside public gets only partial and too often prejudiced pictures. What is possible in and good for Russia, is not necessarily possible in and good for other countries. Still, there is much which can be learnt from this stupendous endeavour to construct a social order entirely different from any that prevails in Europe or Asia.

Dominion Surrenders Status:—While we in India are aspiring to Dominion Status, Newfoundland, the oldest of the British self-governing Dominions, has found the burden too heavy and has become a Crown Colony. The New Statesman thus summarises the report of the Royal Commission which investigated the affairs of this Dominion: "Newfoundland is bankrupt and a pauper. Its budget has been unbalanced for twelve years; the debt of the country has been doubled, its resources plundered and squandered. The majority of its inhabitants are living or dying pitably—at subsistence level. Greed, graft and corruption are rampant, the "spoils system" is practised in its crudest form; politician is a synonym for crook." Newfoundland is a wholly British settlement. The British, wherever they go, are supposed to carry with them their capacity for self-government. How they came to deteriorate as they seem to have done in Newfoundland is a suitable subject for historical research. The moralist may point to the event as the inevitable sequel to the ruthless extermination of the native inhabitants, the Boethucks which preceded the settlement.

Indians and British Ships:—Mr. Shoran S. Singha has written a letter to the Spectator of the 24th November calling attention to the treatment of Indians in the P. and O. steamers. He says, "The general tenor of the experience of students on the voyage from Bombay to Tillbury is that their presence is not acceptable to their fellow passengers. Cases of gross incivility and downright rudeness are by no means infrequent. While on the way out matters are worse." He asks some searching questions: "Why do some of the British, more often than not, get up and walk away if an Indian happens to sit on the same sofa or in a chair near to them in the lounge or the smokeroom? Why must a Frenchwoman who only very recently boarded a boat at Port Said, be told that she must not talk to the Indians, or discuss her paintings of Oriental scenes with them, or sit at their table as she would be letting down White prestige?" Mr. Singha winds up with a home-thrust. "Why," he asks, "do British passengers quite gladly fraternise with the Indian on the Continental lines where no discrimination is either allowed or tolerated, when those very people would be aloof and even overbearing when the Union Jack flies over the steamer?" He adds that the broad fact remains that Indians generally find the atmosphere on an English boat less conducive to happiness than on an Italian one. As the result of several years' experience Mr. Singha avers that unnecessary and unfortunate bitterness against Britain is being created in many hearts owing to incivil treatment on British boats.

Fascist or Communist:—Pandit Jawharlal Nehru is reported in the Free Press Journal to have informed some foreign correspondents whom he addressed at Delhi that as between Fascism and Communism he inclined to the former. In some former utterances he gave the impression of having a leaning the other way. We do not mention this as a reflection but as a proof of the Pandit's openness of mind. But is it necessary that one should declare himself to be either a Fascist or a Bolshevik? May not one appreciate the good points of Fascism without accepting it as a whole and without decrying the other? Sovietism has succeeded in Russia and Fascism in Italy. This is due to the historical conditions and the national character of the two peoples. The system that will suit India has yet to be evolved. It will have to start from our historical conditions and be moulded by Indian character which is opposed to extremes and is rooted in continuity.

Strangled by Red Tape:—A communique issued by the Punjab Government on December 5th throws light on the administration of the Lahore Central Jail. A prisoner had been sentenced to death by the Sessions Court, and his appeal to the High Court had been rejected, as also his petitions for mercy to the Governor-in-Council and the Governor-General-in-Council. The date for his execution was fixed by the Jail authorities for the 21st of November. On the 19th instant of that month a telegram was received in the Secretariat, so the communique informs us, from the father of the condemned prisoner, stating that he proposed to file an appeal before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and on receipt of the telegram, the usual order directing the postponement of execution was drawn up and despatched to the Central Jail by a special messenger "on the morning of November 20 - 19th November being a holiday." The cover containing these orders was duly received in the Jail office, but "was not opened or placed before the Superintendent until November 21 by which time the execution had been carried out." The Government communique further informs us that an enquiry is now being held by a responsible officer under the directions of Government with the object of fixing the blame for this most unfortunate occurrence and determining whether there is any defect requiring amendment in the rules regulating the procedure to be adopted in such cases. The communique on the face of it seems already to "fix" the blame on the individual, if there is such a one, whose duty it is to "open the post" of the Superintendent. One glaring defect in the procedure which strikes even a casual reader is the precedence which holidays apparently take over important matters of life and death.

Gandhiji at the Round Table Conference:—In a letter to the press Gandhiji, with reference to his position on the communal question at the Round Table Conference, says "I told my Muslim friends that Dr. Ansari held my conscience on Muslim matters in his pocket and that, therefore, they should cooperate with me in securing his presence at the conference. To this they would not agree unless I would first accept their demands." We do not quite understand this point. The Congress was assigned fifteen seats in the Round Table Conference and it is not quite clear why there should have been an appeal to the Muslim delegation to get Dr. Ansari who could have gone as a Congress delegate to the Conference.

BOMBAY, DECEMBER 16, 1933.

INDIA 1931-32.

An annual review of Indian affairs is published under the authority of the Government of India and with the general approval of the Secretary of State. The reader is warned in a prefatory note that "it must not be understood that the approval either of the Secretary of State or of the Government of India extends to every particular expression of opinion." As neither of the authorities gives even by analogy any indication of the particular expressions of opinion to which their approval should not be extended, the reservation virtually amounts to repudiation of responsibility for the whole report. Who then is responsible for it or for those expressions of opinion which may be disapproved by the Government of India? In previous issues the name of the Director of Information for the time being was given as that of the author of the review. In this issue there is no name. If there is any misstatement or expression of opinion which is not justified by facts, no responsibility is incurred either by the authorities under whose aegis the review is published or by the person who wrote or edited it. While editors of newspapers are obliged by the law to print their names in every issue of their journals, the author of this review is privileged to remain anonymous and irresponsible for anything that he may say and which the Government of India may not approve. This can be hardly regarded as a satisfactory position, particularly as this review is the chief source of information on Indian affairs to people outside India.

The opening chapter of the review on "Politics and Administration" is the only part of it which will be read by the generality of readers. It deals with topics on which there has been much controversy. The author referring to the Gandhi-Irwin Pact and its ratification by the Karachi Congress makes out that, while Mr. Gandhi was perfectly sincere in his desire to give effect to its terms, his followers used or misused it to enhance the prestige of the Congress at the expense of Government. The trend of his narrative is that Lord Irwin was a well-meaning but weak-minded man and that Gandhiji was powerless to control the extremism of his followers and lieutenants. That the Pact was distasteful to many Congressmen is true. Lord Irwin and Mr. Gandhi both knew the fact. In view of Lord Irwin's statements since his retirement from the Viceroyalty it is not for anyone else to criticise the reviewer's estimate of his policy in bringing about the Pact. As for Gandhiji, if he thought that his lieutenants were seeking to evade the terms of the Pact, he did not certainly show it in his conduct. On the contrary, he made himself their spokesman and almost gave up the idea of attending the Round Table Conference which Lord Irwin was most anxious that he should. Then, again it is hard to understand how in the light of subsequent developments the reviewer tries to make out that there had been no breaches of the terms of the Pact by Local Governments. Just as many Congressmen were against the Pact so many Provincial Governments were far from enthusiastic about it and the complaints formulated in the Congress "charge-sheet" were not disposed of so lightly as the reviewer suggests.

According to the author the prospect of Indian States coming immediately into the Federation accentuated the apprehensions of the minority communities, particularly the Muslims. The decision of the Princes brought responsibility at the Centre within early reach and Muslims would not have responsibility at the Centre unless their demands were conceded. We doubt if this is a correct description of the Muslim position: it does not seem to be consistent with the often repeated declarations of Muslim leaders. On another important point the author is equally vague. He does not seem to have clearly understood Gandhiji's attitude to the representation of the depressed classes. The question of separate electorates for the depressed classes did not arise until Gandhiji opposed the reservation of seats for them and would not have arisen but for his opposition. Many friends, including Congressmen, were surprised at Gandhiji's uncompromising opposition to reservation of seats for the depressed classes. The Poona Pact which was necessitated by the consequences of this unfortunate opposition, has not avoided separate electorates but only restricted them to the primary election of persons who may stand as candidates at the general election. The Pact has been criticised on other grounds also and it is probable that it will have to be modified.

The refusal of the Viceroy to receive Gandhiji and discuss with him the political situation has been regarded as most unfortunate by almost every one who has commented on it. The reviewer boldly avers that it received a large measure of public support. His laboured justification of the Viceroy's refusal is unlikely to make many converts to his view. He says that the Viceroy could treat Gandhiji only as the representative of the Congress (and not as a friend as Gandhiji wished) and that unless Gandhiji dissociated himself from Congress activities—that is, repudiated the Congress—His Excellency could not receive him. This may be officially the correct attitude but statesmanship cannot be held in bondage by red tape. Mr. De Valera was not obliged to repudiate the Republican organization when he was invited by Mr. Lloyd George to confer on the settlement of the Irish problem. The only difference between the two cases is that the Irish unlike the Indian leader did not profess non-violence. Mr. Rushbrook Williams, in more than one of the annual reviews which he wrote, acknowledged that whenever the non-violent movement flourished the violent revolutionary movement hid its head. The author, however, regards it as a fortunate accident that terrorism has, as an organised movement, been confined to Bengal. But is it really an accident? May not it be evidence of the depth to which the sentiment in favour of non-violence had permeated the masses? If the Viceroy had realised, as perhaps Lord Irwin did, what great service Gandhiji has rendered to India and the world by his propaganda of non-violence, His Excellency would have overlooked whatever technical objections there might have been to his receiving Gandhiji. The history of the last two years, in that case, would have been different. Mistakes have been made on both sides. Lord Willingdon has said that he is sincerely anxious to make India fully self-governing as soon as possible and Gandhiji has repeatedly declared his readiness to co-operate with Government to attain this end. We do not accept the view that if Gandhiji is satisfied the whole country will be satisfied, and that the only thing to do, therefore, is to settle with him. This may or may not have been true two years ago but public opinion today would insist on exercising its own independent judgment on constitutional reform. A settlement with Gandhiji is, however, important as it would smooth the way for a discussion of the political issue solely on its merits.

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA—XIV. TO PARIS

The "Bremen" was a very fine ship. The "Victoria" and the "Rex" were also the best of their kind, but I thought the "Bremen" was in some respects superior to them. It was roomy, well-ventilated and without superfluous fittings while everything necessary for convenience and comfort was provided. It was a constant entertainment to watch the sea racing past. The speed was terrific. The ship's clocks were put forward one hour—58 minutes to be exact—every day. The voyage was uneventful. There were the usual cinema shows, the "horse-races", the concerts, the unending round of meals, the incessant chatter. Once the ship's siren gave forth five or six agonised blasts in quick succession. It was for a life-belt drill. Before we could find the belts and don them and go to our appointed stations it was all over. Voyages in modern liners have become so safe that these appliances are no longer regarded necessary. A day before we were due to reach France, the mails were "catapulted" in a small plane which was shot out of the topmost deck. We had to climb up early morning to see this done. Two men were in the plane which was shot in to the sky as from a cannon. It flew straight ahead for a short distance, then curved gently and disappeared beyond the horizon.

On the night before we were to land the crew and passengers crowded on deck to see the "Bremen's" sistership "Europa" pass by. She came quite close with all her lights up and glided swiftly away on her long voyage. Passing another ship at sea is an event and a ship so closely related to ours was naturally regarded as a great event.

The Atlantic showed its temper once or twice. Once a huge wave swept over our table and drenched us as we were having our meals. At another time it flooded our cabin through the porthole. Otherwise the giant ship went on her way unperturbed.

There was besides us only one Indian on the "Bremen". He was Mr. Karunakaran, a Rockefeller scholar from Travancore, returning after completing his course of research studies in bacteriology at Washington.

Kamakoti introduced me to a Swiss lady on the boat. She was connected, she told me, with a group of bankers who would like to start industries in partnership with Indians in this country. She wanted to know whether and how this could be done. I told her that I was not a business man and could not give her any helpful information. But I knew something of the temper of the people, and at present it was much too disturbed to entertain any such proposal without suspicion of a fresh attempt at exploitation. When the political situation settled down they would have a better chance of being judged on their merits. The lady thanked me and said that was exactly what her friends felt.

Our tickets were made out for Southampton. But the news from India made us change our mind. Southampton is about two or three hours voyage from Cherbourg and there is an extra charge to be paid for landing at the French port. The "Bremen" stopped some distance from the pier, and passengers and their luggage were put down on a large open launch. There was a drizzle which in the early morning was not very pleasant. To compensate for this we had a nearly complete circle of the rainbow right to the west. The colours were quite bright. We were glad to see this ancient symbol of hope and faith at that moment. Under this glorious arch the noble ship which brought us sailed away. She was soon lost in the mist which hung over the sea at Cherbourg that morning.

The Customs inspection in France is rather more strict than in other countries but we had no reason to complain of it. A French woman inspector asked Kamakoti about our things. She asked her to open a handbag and, after a glance at its contents, chalk-marked it as also the rest of our luggage. The man whose things were next to ours had to open all his trunks and submit to a meticulous examination of their contents. Perhaps, he was a German!

The North German Lloyds have their own special train to Paris and we had our places reserved in it. With our recent experience of the admirably ordered American railways, we found the journey by this French railway rather irksome. But the scenery on either side of the route was very pretty. Small neat houses, well-cultivated farms, thriving townships, passed quickly across one's vision. Our first view of the pleasant land of France! At about noon the train stops. We are in Paris!

Like the train, the hotel where we put up, seemed cramped in comparison with American hotels. The arrangements here were entirely different. The waiters wore long black coats and one felt that to order anything of these men would be offering them an indignity.

In the evening we went out for a stroll and stepped into a bookshop to get a map of Paris. While Kamakoti was selecting the map, I looked over the books and pictures outside. On the top of the bookstall was lying a volume with the title, in French, "Unexpurgated Edition of the Kamasutra of Katyayana" to whom, by the way, such an authority as Havelock Ellis refers with great respect as; one of the pioneer explorers in the science of sex. Evidently it is more read in Europe.

than in India at the present day. In an adjoining shelf there were numerous pictures of Parisian interest. Among these were some of women in a state of complete nudity. This is not regarded as obscene in Europe. The European view in matters of sex relationship is markedly different from that of Christian preachers and more nearly the same as that of the Indian people. Our missionary friends have exercised a sort of moral terrorism on Indian minds for the best part of a century while all the time they knew that things were much the same in their own homelands, if, indeed, not a little worse from their point of view. Their doctrine of sin flows like water off a duck's back in Western minds. With far less reason, it has a lowering effect on Asiatics disciplined by centuries of faith in an unseen Principle. An Indian friend domiciled in the United States is never tired of telling his friends in America, that if the Negroes had adopted Islam instead of Christianity lynching would never have been thought of. He himself is a Christian.

Unlike the natives of other European cities, the Frenchman as a rule shows no disposition to help out the stranger in his streets who does not know his language. "Parlez vous française?" he asks. When you say no—he shrugs his shoulders and spreads his hands as much as to say nothing can be done for you. It is remarkable that although France is England's next door neighbour and her ally in the War, so few Frenchmen could or would speak English as compared with the other countries of Europe which we visited.

From our hotel in the heart of Paris we were able to see a good deal in the short time we were there. Paris is a noble city with its parks and palaces. There was an air of preoccupation, however, and even anxiety about the people in the streets, and but little of the gaiety which is associated with the French capital in other countries. Was it the resuscitation of the German spirit by Herr Hitler?

Going to our rooms in the evening I heard the strains of a vina and on enquiry learnt that a prince of Nepal and his family were there and that they were frequent guests in the Hotel Mirabeau.

We left Paris by the Rome Express and were at Genoa next afternoon. We were by now fairly familiar with localities in this city and declined the services of the guide who showed us round on our first visit. This man was born and educated in America but for some reason had come to Italy which was the land of his forbears. An American priest—Irish Catholic—told me on the voyage to New York that his guide in Rome recognised him as the Reverend Father who ministered to him when he was an inmate of Sing Sing.

A COMMUNIST UTOPIA.

Mr. Emile Burns in his recent book, "Capitalism Communism and the Transition" (Publishers, Victor Gollancz Ltd., Price 5/-), explains the advantages which the Communist state of the future will possess over the capitalist state of the present day. What is more he regards Communism as the only method of solving the present economic tangle. Capitalism, he points out, carries within itself the germs of destruction. Most economists are agreed that progress in the methods of production has far outstripped the prevailing system of distribution. Every government in Europe and in America concerns itself to-day largely with the question of remedying this defect. Mr. Burns' argument that Communism will develop as naturally out of the proletarian struggle with a decaying Capitalist class as the present system developed out of the early struggle with the feudal system does not carry conviction. It is difficult, however, to argue with a Communist who regards the benevolent attitude of some modern states towards the working classes as arising out of a fear of proletarian power, and at the same time condemns displays of force on the part of other states as equally indicative of the approaching death of Capitalism. The Fascist State comes in for severe criticism at the hands of Mr. Burns for doing very much the same things that he excuses in the Soviet Government on grounds of expediency. Mr. Burns is also apt to forget that in contrasting Communist society of the future with present day Capitalism he is comparing an ideal with what is very much a reality.

One of the most interesting chapters in Mr. Burns' book is his survey of Capitalist Society. He shows how conceptions which in their day represented certain ideals, are today meaningless. "For example, the conceptions of democracy, of personal liberty and the freedom of speech and of the Press developed out of the struggle of the nascent capitalist class against the feudal system which it had to overthrow. The rising capitalist class set the idea of democracy against absolutism and the arbitrary rule of feudal monarchs; it set the idea of liberty against the restrictions on traders imposed by the feudal lords and the guilds; it set the ideas of equality and the equal rights of man against feudal privileges and rank; it set the ideas of unrestricted science and philosophy against the trammels of the feudal Church." Now, however, that the working classes have, at any rate according to the Communists, in their turn objected to privileges enjoyed by the Capitalist class these conceptions have acquired a different and more restricted meaning. No one can deny the truth of Mr. Burns' indictment against the limitations placed on the ideals of freedom and democracy in the modern state.

Although in his description of the Communist state Mr. Burns is careful to warn his readers against believing that complete Communism can be attained overnight, yet it is evident from his chapters on the transition period that he regards the attainment of that ideal as a practical proposition. He emphasises the importance of proletarian organisation. To attain the Communist end a vast programme covering the educational, industrial and even social life of the people is enunciated. Fascism, Nazism and everything else is regarded by Mr. Burns as merely the last protest of decaying Capitalism. Communism, with its international programme of abolition of national barriers and wars, and its promise to the individual of equal opportunities for all, is Mr. Burns' conception of the society of the future. Our author views present day tendencies in Soviet Russia with the eyes of a Marxist. In view, however, of Mr. Burns' rather depressing conclusion that every state will have to undergo a long period of transition with an inevitable series of conflicts between capitalists and the working classes, most of his readers will realise that the coming of the new social order will be delayed for a generation.

IF I WERE TWENTY AGAIN II

(BY DR. J. T. SUNDERLAND.)

If I were twenty again, I would take care to lay for myself the best foundation possible of physical health. I would remember that a sound mind needs a sound body to make its activities effective. I would ride a bicycle, I would play tennis, I would row a boat, I would swim, I would take long walks; I would do physical work where opportunity offered. If I had muscles like an ox, and plenty of money to pay surgeons to set my broken limbs, perhaps I would play football. I would certainly endeavour in all rational ways to build up for myself a strong, vigorous and healthy body, as a physical basis for my life work in the world. I would not willingly violate any of the laws of life and health. But I would make myself intelligent as to what those laws are, and then I would obey them as the holy laws of God.

If I were twenty I would greatly prize worthy friends and friendships, and would set out to make much of them for all life. That should be counted a great day when a new and noble friendship was formed or an old one deepened. Nor should I have any fear lest friends might not be true. I would determine myself to be true, and that would be sufficient guarantee that they would be.

If I were twenty again I would set out to keep my life in close touch with nature. I would be an observer and a student of nature. "Nature never did betray the heart of him that loved her." I would be her lover fond and true. I would know the secret nooks of the wild flowers, and their times of blooming. I would know the friendly trees and their habits. I would know the birds around me and their songs. I would know the stars above my head, and the mysterious phenomena of the clouds. I would know the winds and the waters. All these should be my associates and prized friends. For nothing, like companionship with nature, can keep the eye bright, the step elastic, the heart young, and make us wise with that wisdom that never grows old.

If I were twenty again, I would set out to lead a simple life—a life as little enslaved as possible by the artificialities and the conventionalities of society. I would make Emerson's motto mine, "Plain living and high thinking," for there is not much high thinking in this world except where there is plain living. I would aim at simple tastes and simple habits; simplicity in clothing, simplicity in food, simplicity in enjoyments. Simple things wear, they do not pall. They are new every morning and fresh every evening. Whereas the elaborate and the artificial give pleasure for a little while, but soon tire us, over-burden us, wear out our lives.

If I were twenty again I wouldn't smoke. I would save the thousand dollars which smoking would cost me by the time I reached middle life and put the money into books. I would preserve a sweet breath, instead of manufacturing for myself a foul one. I would keep my blood pure, instead of filling it with tobacco. I would keep my pulse strong and my heart-beat vigorous, instead of wearing out my pulse, bringing on myself what the doctors call the tobacco heart, and needlessly shortening my life.

If I were twenty, and looked at things as I do now I certainly would not bet; I certainly would not gamble; I certainly would never buy a lottery ticket. I don't believe I would play billiards; and I don't believe I would play cards. Not that there is any harm in billiards of themselves. The game is one that might be commended if it could be disconnected from its associations. But it is hard to conceive of a game more generally associated with drinking, with smoking, with betting in a small way—and sometime in large ways—and with society that is far from the best. If a young man knows how to play billiards that very knowledge opens the door and almost drag him into low associations. Can any self-respecting young man, whose time, money and character are worth something, afford it? I don't believe he can.

Much the same seems true of cards. Of course cards of themselves are as harmless as any other bit of pasteboard, except for their use. And we can easily conceive of their being used in ways wholly unobjectionable. But two or three things are to be said of them. They are the common instruments of gambling, so that if a young man is a good player it is much more easy than it otherwise would be for him to fall into gambling habits. Still further, card playing affords to the player no physical exercise; it is not carried on in the open air, as such games as tennis are; it is an enormous waster of time; it seems actually to kill intellectual life wherever it goes. There are hundreds and thousands of communities all up and down this country that seem mentally dead; you can't stir up an interest in any intellectual thing; and the cause is cards. The people go to innumerable progressive euchre and other card parties, and the result seems to be the impossibility of creating an interest in anything higher.

It is these evil effects that seem everywhere to be associated with card playing, that makes me class it with billiard playing, and incline me to believe that, on the whole, it is a serious evil, and that the best way to deal with it is to let it alone.

If I were twenty again, I would learn to sing—if I had any musical capacity at all; and if circumstances would allow, I would learn to play an instrument. Music is such an excellent recreation; it fills so important a place in the social circle and the home, and it is such a joy and inspiration in all human life, that I cannot but think young people make a serious mistake who neglect it.

If I were twenty again, I would make distinct provision for the joy side of life. Not that pleasure-seeking is the highest aim of existence. The man who lives simply for pleasure will fail of his object, or he ought to. Nevertheless, pleasure is legitimate in life. It ought to be scattered all along through life. We should not willingly neglect any fitting opportunity to smile, to laugh, to sing, to play with little children, to enter into the joy of others, to notice beautiful objects, to catch the sunshine, to make others happy, and thus find happiness for ourselves.

If I were twenty, with my life yet to be lived, I would set out to walk through this world on my own feet. My feet may not be very good, but they are better than crutches. My intellect may be inferior in strength and vigour to some other man's, but it is the one that God has given me, and I would trust it. "Self-respect" and "self-reliance" are words to be written on the banner of every life, that proposes to achieve worthy ends.

If I were twenty, and knew what I know now, I would dare, I would dare to an extent that few young men do. But I would dare in directions in which daring is worth while, and not in those where it is contemptible. There is a kind of daring popular in some quarters that is simply weakness under another name.

A young fellow is challenged by another to fight. There is no good reason why he should fight. To do so will be silly and brutal. But his companions look on and laugh and shout that he is afraid. He hasn't courage to withstand that laugh, and so fights. It is his cowardice that makes him fight, not his bravery.

Splendid as was the heroism of the men who fought the war for the reunion, the anti-slavery reformers were more heroic. It took higher courage to be a Garrison, a Wendell Phillips, or a Theodore Parker, than to be a Grant, a Sherman or Sheridan.

The supreme sphere for bravery in this world is that of the moral. There is no other such heroism as that of duty.

If I were a young man again, I would set out upon life daring to be on the side of what seemed to me true and right, at whatever cost. No matter how unpopular a cause might be, if it commended itself to me as just, and in the interest of humanity, it should have such support as I could give it. Since God has given me but one life, I would try to make of it something worth while. And that can't be done by playing the shirk or the coward.

If I were twenty again, and saw things as I do now, I would not live for myself alone. I would begin at once planning for some distinct service of my fellows. Many young people of good intention make a mistake here. They wait; they postpone efforts at service. They say: Now we must give all our time to our studies, or to getting a start in business. When study is passed, or when we are well established in business, then we shall have time to plan for the helping of others. But will they have any more time then than now? Will they be any less selfish then than now? The very delay will tend to dry up their sympathies. The probabilities are very strong that any of us who allow ourselves to live for ourselves alone now, and to forget others now, will not much improve in any future. Now is the accepted time. Now is the day of salvation. If any of us believe in helpful and unselfish lives, the only safe thing to do is to begin living such lives to-day, no matter where we are or what our circumstances may be.

If I were twenty again, what attitude would I take toward religion? I answer, What attitude could I take except that of interest in it, as something which represents the highest side of human life?

What would my religion be? It could be only one thing, if, going back to twenty, I carried with me the light and experience which I now have. It would have to be that reasonable, that natural, that beautiful religion of the spirit which Jesus taught and which is gathered up into diamond points of flashing light, in the Golden Rule, the blessing craved on enemies, the Lord's Prayer, and the commands to love God and our neighbour. This is the religion which satisfies the reason, the conscience and the heart of man, everywhere. Certainly this is the religion which all that is best within me welcomes, with satisfaction and great joy.

If I were twenty again, would I be afraid of religious inquiry? A thousand times No. Can we believe that God has made it safer for a man to go through the world with his eyes shut than with them open?

If I were twenty again what church would I interest myself in? I would make myself intelligent concerning all I would try to study all with an open mind and a sympathetic spirit. And then, whichever one I found the freest, and in line with the best intelligence and soundest conscience of the time; whichever one I found teaching most clearly and exemplifying best the pure, simple, noble religion of Jesus and the human soul, that church should be my church, and to it, with all my heart I would pledge my adhesion, my love, and my life-long loyalty.

Here I close.

Such, then, is my answer, fragmentary and incomplete, but as full as time permits, to the question, What would I do if I were twenty again?

I shall not become twenty again. God allows none of us to go back to re-tread the road over which we have once passed. Doubtless it is best that He does not. It is better to go forward than back. Courage for the future rather than regrets for the past, is the need of us all. But if any of us who are a little farther along the path than some of the rest, can call back words of suggestion, or warning, or cheer, surely it is well.

WHITHER INDIA?*

(BY WALTER E. CLARK.)

The leaders of Indian Nationalism fall into three well-marked groups which represent three very different tendencies of thought.

The aim of the Liberals has never gone beyond that of colonial self-government. Leaders such as Dadabhai Naoroji, Sir Pheroz Shah Mehta, Sir Surendranath Banerjee, and Gopal Krishna Gokhale have been very outspoken in their criticism of Government. Although critical of Government and demanding Home Rule they have drawn the greater part of their cultural background from the West. Their ideal was that of forming an Indian nation, but their democratic and constitutional ideas were drawn from Western writers. Their moderate policy dominated the Indian National Congress until 1915-16. Since then the spread of the other two tendencies of thought and the drift towards non-co-operation or even towards violence has been so rapid that their present role is comparatively insignificant.

The second group, which seems at present to be the most influential one, consists of those who are dominated by a romantic attitude towards ancient Indian civilisation and who work for the revival of a supposed Golden Age of Indian civilisation either in exactly the present form of Hinduism or in a purer form of Hinduism from which many medieval accretions have been removed. Their whole cultural background is Indian, they have great distrust of the West in general, of its political, social, and economic institutions, and especially of its industrialism. Politically they have been dominated by a sort of philosophical anarchism which would minimize the foundation of the state or actually destroy it and leave as the dominating element more or less self-sufficient village organisations and caste groups. The best government is that which governs least. This ideal of merely co-ordinating the social life of groups (of federalizing and decentralizing) is the antithesis of the present Western tendency of extending more and more the principle of the sovereignty of the state until it guides or controls practically all activity within the state. They do not believe that the industrialism of India is inevitable or desirable, and would revert to a rural India. Joined to this is the conviction (as best exemplified by Gandhi) that their task is moral rather than political. The basis for all development consists in the cleansing and purifying of the individual. If individual swaraj (self-rule) is gained political swaraj (self-rule or independence) will take care of itself.

On the whole Gandhi can better be understood from a religious point of view than from a Western political point of view, and his service to India has been greater in this respect than in a purely political respect. He tends to put moral and social conundrums rather than to discuss concrete political problems. His is a nationalism of self-supporting villages and an economics based on the hand-plough and the spinning-wheel. Although politically his influence will amount to little he has been an enormous moral force in Indian society and a rallying-point for the Indian sentiment of nationality. He has striven hard for the removal of untouchability, for raising the social position of the outcastes and low castes, for the prohibition of liquor and drugs, for the removal of purdah (seclusion of women), for the equality of men and women, for Hindu-Muslim unity, for a doctrine of non-killing and non-violence which shall permeate the whole of social and political life. Fundamental in Gandhi during the later part of his development is a revolt against the intellect.

In spite of the presence of large groups of ultra-conservatives who would interpret Hinduism strictly according to the letter of the law and continue it unchanged, there is in this group a widely diffused heaven of indirect Western influence towards the development of Neo-Hinduism marked by the abolishment of untouchability, the raising of the age of marriage, the remarriage of widows, the doing away with purdah (seclusion of women), and social service of various kinds. This is interpreted, however, not as a direct copying of the West but as the lopping off of what are to be regarded as decadent medieval development and the reverting to an earlier and purer form of Hinduism.

Politically the methods of the Romantic Idealist have been partly violent, as in the case of Tilak and his school, and partly nonviolent, as in the case of Gandhi and his followers.

The third group is made up of those who like Bipin Chandra Pal, Aurobindo Ghose, and Rabindranath Tagore would make a synthesis of Indian and Western ideas, giving up such elements in Hinduism as seem to be unreasonable and adapting to Indian use such Western knowledge and ideas and institutions as seem to be suitable and reasonable. At present they seem to be overshadowed by Gandhi, but are likely to have increasing influence in the future.

As opposed to those who would see in Indian nationalism only a reactionary religious element dominated by a few Brahman leaders Pal sees the beginning of a real national movement growing out of an awakened consciousness of Indian culture.

Many have argued that India is uncivilized and disorderly and unfit for independence because it has never organised itself into one united and lasting empire. But India is as large as Europe, and although Europe has never developed into a single state Europe is not considered to be uncivilized. There are in India greater racial differences than in Europe. The caste system seems to owe its origin principally to the effort to bring about a political and social co-operation between these racial groups, while preserving so far as possible the racial integrity and the cultural dominance and purity of the Aryan minority without allowing it to diffuse itself through the culture of the aboriginal majority and become completely submerged. The social and religious system of Hinduism, which is a synthesis of Aryan and Dravidian elements, has diffused over India a uniformity which is at least as great as the uniformity spread over Europe by Christianity. Further, the period of British rule has helped to weaken diversities of interest and to form a unity of sentiment based on common needs and common fears which has slowly been developing into a national spirit not only among the various Hindu groups but among Hindus and non-Hindus.

To a considerable degree India has developed a common civilisation, although this has been more incoherent than the closely organised and institutional civilisations of Western nations. India is not yet a nation, but a nation in the making. The forces which might cause groups with varying interests to co-operate towards the formation of a nation seem, at present, to be gaining in strength over those which might cause disruption. The presence of such a large Muhammadan minority whose religion is so fundamentally different from Hinduism, and the fact that one-third of India consists of Native States whose rulers are absolute monarchs constitute the chief difficulty in the situation. There seems to be, however, a growing tendency towards co-operation between Hindus and Muhammadans, and the Native States are beginning to feel a solidarity with British India and to be willing to co-operate with it towards the formation of some sort of a political unity.

I am inclined to think that this growing sentiment of nationalism in India will not result in a simple democratic nationality but in some sort of a federal nationality of co-operating groups. The ideal of a united democratic India is infinitely remote and the insistence upon this by the British government has served to retard rather than to hasten Indian political development.

The weakest feature of the programme of the Romanticists who now seem to be in control of the situation is their tendency to regard religion as the one great unifying and controlling force in the political sphere. There is need of closer objective practical study of the political, social, and economic interests of all the various communities which must co-operate towards Indian Nationalism. If India is to emerge from her medievalism, a civic spirit and a new humanism must accompany, if not dominate, a purely religious spirit. Even the Synthesists, especially men like Tagore and Ghose, have been dominated by an almost exclusively literary and religious outlook. More than anything else India needs the formation of a new class of Kshatriyas, but one better adapted to the new conditions than the old nobility, which should take the lead in practical affairs and in government and buttressed by men of literature and religion, guide India on her new path.

India's independence, in some form or other, seems to be measurably near. A spirit of non-co-operation may, to a certain extent, be effective against a foreign government, but a spirit of co-operation within Hinduism itself (and co-operation really represents the highest ideal of Hinduism) is the only thing which can revivify a Hinduism which has grown sluggish and stagnant, and a spirit of co-operation between Hindus and Muhammadans, and between British India and the Native States is the only thing which can hasten independence and save an independent India from political chaos.

India will not become completely Westernized socially and religiously and philosophically. There is and there probably always will be a struggle between Romanticists and Synthesists, but India has been brought so actively into the current of world affairs that she cannot shut herself up into seclusion and regain a romantic past. Slowly but surely a synthesis will be made. Many unessential matters in Hinduism, matters which cannot stand the test of a higher critical knowledge, will atrophy, but the basic and essential ideals will stand out only more clearly as a result and are likely to have some formative influence on the West.

Mr. G. K. Devadhar.—Mr. G. K. Devadhar, it is learnt, will preside over the Indian National Social Conference to be held at Madras on the 29th instant.

THE UNTOUCHABLES OF AMERICA.*

(By P. GANESH RAO.)

The Negro race through hundreds of years of close living and intermingling with the Whites, is far removed from the African type of Negro, both in physical and mental make-up. The African type is a rarity to be found only amongst the few centenarians in the South. The younger generation varies mostly from a dark chocolate brown to a very white shade; there is the 'Creole' in the State of Louisiana, which inherits many of the finer physical characteristics of the French who settled down there long ago and resembles them in many ways, even speaking a peculiar brogue with many a French word. There is the 'Mulatto' and the 'High Yellow'—light in complexion with a tinge of yellow, square-faced and powerful-jawed, with a strong affinity to the Irish, who migrated and settled down in many of the Southern States as farmers. You will find a number of Negroes mixed with Germans and Jews and many other nationalities of Eastern Europe. There are certain peculiarities which can be easily traced to the parent stock. There is the beautiful type of brown Negro which is the product of intermingling with the American Red Indians. The Red Indians, the aborigines of the land, war-like and stalwart, would not yield to the White man even after being subdued. They, in their hatred of the white conquerors, kept aloof and mixed rather with the Negroes. While America is often described as the 'Melting Pot', it should not be forgotten that out of this crucible, one of the newest and strangest of the human races, the new Negro race which has assimilated the best of all the nations, is emerging. He is a new product, something unique, something inexplicable, with vast possibilities and possessing great potential power. He is physically stalwart and heroic, mentally keen and alert, with a conscious pride, generous and forgiving, save when you wound his vanity.

The Negro population is an immense one, nearly 28 millions out of the total of 125 millions, though the Census never puts it at more than 15 to 16 millions. This latter figure has been quoted for the last two decades and yet it is admitted that the negroes double themselves every 20 years, the brown and yellow races in 40 years, and the whites in 80 years. For some mysterious reason, the American negro is kept in a psychological state of 'Inferiority Complex'.

Of this total population, nearly all but a little over a million lived in their native home—the Southern States of Missouri and Mississippi, Arkansas, Carolinas, Virginia, Georgia, Louisiana, etc. But during and just after the World War, many moved northwards attracted by high factory wages and got away from the farms and the clutches of the Southern exploiters. The North, with its big industrial centres, offered great scope to these hard working and powerfully built negroes, who did not mind strenuous work as long as they were paid well. Nearly seven millions of them migrated out from the South—the land of darkness, injustice and slavery—to the North which seemed a veritable Heaven!

The American negro has imitated the white man in all his ways. He long ago discarded his strange African language—he adopted the English names of his masters; borrowed the Bible and the Christian religion relinquishing his paganism. He started Negro Religious Orders and Societies such as the Free Mason, Elks, Woodmen, Daughters of Ethiopia, Royal Order of African Princes, etc. His habits and habits, customs and manners, his ways of thinking are all patterned after those of the Whites. His penchant for sports, for Art, Drama, Music, Dance and Culture in general are all modelled after those of his masters.

History will include the names of many an African flower that blossomed in American soil. African seeds sown and grafted, nursed and nurtured in the sunshine of American Institutions flowered forth adding colour, fragrance and charm to that peculiar American civilisation.

Booker T. Washington, born a slave on a Southern cotton plantation, self-educated and self made, trusted and honoured alike by his white confreres, famous author of 'Up from Slavery', is a shining example of what a Negro can do. His views were moderate, respectful co-operation with the Whites, accepting and utilising all the available facilities.

The philosophy of his life and teachings are best summed up in his famous words 'throw your bucket where you are' meaning, take the fullest advantage of the opportunities right at your door and then work for more. His maxim was economic freedom first and last. The Booker T. Washington University at Tuskegee, Alabama, is a noble monument to his life-work of spreading education—vocational, technical, industrial and in small Trades and Crafts. It is one of the most fully equipped Negro institutions for Arts, Science, Medicine and Engineering.

Few people outside the group of scientists would ever realise who is the man responsible for so many of the bye-products of peanut. Doctor Carver is credited with discovering the scientific food-value of peanut and also producing over 63 varieties of articles both from the peanut and its shell, practically utilising every part of the fruit.

Drs. DuBois, Abbot and Cook are names with which thousands of people are well acquainted, both in the North and the South. They belong to the moderate school of thought, which has a larger following among the negro intelligentsia and has steady support from the professionals. Springing from humble origins, they have gained enviable positions in their different spheres of life.

Dr. DuBois is a great literary person, who mastered German and French besides possessing a thorough command over English. For his simple poetic style, with a peculiar charm and grace, for threading his thoughts with enchantment and silvery dreaminess, for leading you into the sub-currents of human passions and pathetic emotions, for ploughing into the deep sea of negro life, for sensing the thrill and warmth of a surging flood of colour, there is not a writer, Negro or White, who so faithfully analyses negro life. His 'The Soul of the Black People' and 'Dark Water' are two gems of Negro contribution to American literature.

Dr. Abbot is one of those modern Negroes whose ethics is plain living and high thinking. Coming to Chicago as an unknown youth about two decades ago, he is to-day the most influential character in Negro doings. Though he studied law and was fully qualified for the Bar, he felt the need of the hour and supplied the long-felt want by starting his Chicago Defender. In a very short period it rose to be the most powerful weekly with 16 pages of varied matter. It steadily grew in bulk, quality, and circulation till to-day it occupies a foremost place in the American journalistic world.

For its short but able leaderette, its highly valuable articles and suggestions, the artistic taste and orderliness of its 'get-up'—both print and contents—its featured columns of child interest and comic serial with a humane touch—its sports column, its woman's page, its medical article on Health and Hygiene, it was soon hailed as the world's greatest weekly. Dr. Abbot's rise from an oblivious apprentice earning 20 dollars a month to be a millionaire with a beautiful bungalow on one of Chicago's finest Boulevards, a fleet of cars from a Rolls Royce to a Ford, is a drama in itself.

What a galaxy of musical stars this negro race has produced. Masters of Rhythm and Melody, with a controlled and cultured voice with rich and clear tonings, giving rainbow shades and colourings to their voice, deep from the soul-music divine!

Who has heard Roland Hayes, the Georgia Tenor and not felt enraptured, thrilled and lost in ecstasy! Colour, creed and race all shrink back to barbaric crudities when you listen to Hayes' gorgeous and soul-touching music. Charles Garner, an Evanston (Ill) youth, who was discovered and encouraged by Mrs. McCormick the elder, is the son of a poor janitor and is now recognised as one of the greatest baritone voices. Paul Robeson, who immortalised the song 'Ole Man River' in the famous picture, 'The Show Boat,' is a familiar name in the music world. Erskine Tate, Cab Calloway, Duke Ellington are some of the famous leaders of their own orchestras, who have thrilled huge audiences by their sweet music. Sammy Williams—the wonder boy of Chicago West side—gave up his schooling to become the organist at the Million Dollar theatre, the Regal. Clarence Muse, known to theatre-goers as a versatile genius, playing the king and the villain, the man with a dozen faces, unrivalled for his realism in acting, won a profusion of praise from Mary Garden of Royal Opera fame and other Art critics. Sisle and Blake, Myles and Myles, famous producers of Vaudeville shows, toured the Continent with their musical comedy stars and thus immortalised the American Brown Girl. Bert Williams, William Walker, Billy King are the comedians who have left indelible impressions in the theatre world. Josephine Baker, the modern Cinderella of the Footlights, was an orphaned, unknown Chicago chorus girl only a decade ago. By her agile feet and slim body, by her vivacity, charm and grace, her individuality both on the stage and outside, her captivating personality, she has danced her way from poverty and obscurity to fame and fortune, crowned as the greatest Queen of Modern Jazz. An Italian Duke bewitched by her brown beauty has married Miss Baker, who is now the hostess of an aristocratic Night Club in the Gay Land of Paris.

In the realm of American Banking, the Houses of Anthony Overton and Jesse Binga are famous. Oscar De Priest, a Chicago realtor, amassed enough fortune to devote his energies to politics and became the first coloured member of that august body, the U. S. Congress, in the Hoover administration. Madame Walker and Madame Melone through manufacturing beauty preparations have amassed huge fortunes in the millions. Jack Johnson, the world's greatest pugilist and one time crowned king of the boxers; Harry Wills, the Brown Panther, whom even Jack Dempsey was careful to avoid meeting in the ring; Kid Chocolate and others are familiar names to sporting fans throughout the world.

While the American Negro has bravely faced the situation and fought his way up against all obstacles, nothing dejects him more than the most hideous bar of colour, that separates him from his just share of civic rights. He resents his treatment as an 'untouchable', for often he is even denied admission into theatres, hotels, hospitals, schools, churches, parks and various other public institutions. Due to segregation in trains, trams, bus and station, platform, there are separate compartments for the coloured. The spirit of mob-rule has asserted itself time and again even in the North and resulted in bloody race riots as in East St. Louis and Chicago. The pages of American history are also darkened with the blood stains of many innocent victims of the Ku Klux Klan. Lynching—a cruel, barbarous and most inhuman sight, a pastime with the 'lily white' American—is more inhuman than the Spanish Inquisition of the Middle Centuries.

Close on the heels of Peace and Armistice in 1918 appeared Marcus Gravey, a West Indian Negro, with militant programme and the slogan 'Africa for the Africans'—people of African origin wherever they be, and dinning into his people the motto 'This is not the time to reason why, Negroes must do or die'. He organised the universal Negro Improvement Association, whose membership and funds ran into the tens of millions and whose programme was viewed with suspicion by the U. S. Government. The White American now woke up to the great danger of the situation. It also shamed some of the fair-minded Americans to see this canker eating into the vitals of the nation and they roused the nation, from its lethargy. There are thus to-day inter-racial peace societies preaching tolerance, justice, friendlier co-operation and goodwill to the Negro, and the hope of the future lies in these.

GERMANY AND EUROPE.*

English, French and other continental journals are making great play just now with their reports of the horrors and brutalities practised under the Hitler regime, such brutalities, to quote a recent instance, as that of the young girl who was exposed and ill-treated at Nuremberg, because, as alleged on the placard she was compelled to wear,—she had offered herself to a Jew. The result of this publicity is to arouse a sense of anger against the culprit, followed inevitably by that pitiful human expression, the desire to administer punishment. We are so ready to play the roles of judge, gaoler and executioner, all of which minister to our sense of power. We never seem to realise that the practice of cruelty is the same sin whether it be the act of the avenger or of the original culprit.

Now we would not seek to condone the Nazi method, which like every form of tyranny represents an evil form of Government and one that must finally defeat its own ends,—since tyranny connotes the exercise of forcible interference with individual speech, action and opinion; and no man is ever the better for, or in any way converted by, punishment unless he be truly convinced that he has deserved it. But if we are to understand the phenomenon of Hitlerism, we must seek its causes with an earnest mind, free from prejudice or any preconceived wish to condemn. The common attitude is that indicated by the opening paragraphs of this article, the desire to treat the symptoms in the belief that their forcible suppression must necessarily cure the disease,—as we did in 1919, with the results that now confront us.

Let us begin by regarding Germany for a moment as if that spirit which is most prominent at the present time represented a single human entity. Now the Germany of 1914 had a tendency, it is an exceedingly common one, to megalomania, to the illusion that she had a magnificent destiny. There were ample grounds for such a belief. Industry, concentration and thoroughness in all she undertook had brought great commercial and political success. She had a sincere belief in her own 'Kultur,' and looking about her she did not doubt that the imposition of her ideals upon her neighbours would ultimately raise them in the scale of civilisation. Indeed it is permissible to argue that if, say, France, Belgium and England had been willing to submit to German rule, the Europe of to-day would have been far happier than it actually is.

Now Germany's belief in herself was not destroyed by the miseries of the War nor by the humiliations that followed, but it was most tortuously warped. If you severely punish a man for something which he, personally, believes to be a virtue, when he is released he will persist in his old opinions, but his subsequent endeavour to give effect to them will have a new element of resentment and anger which will react upon his ideals. And Germany to-day is seeking to revive the spirit that animated her twenty years ago by methods whose increased ruthlessness is due to the fact that she is still in bonds. The Nazi storm-troops represent the spirit of the aggressive young Germany, unpurged by suffering, intent upon reviving an ideal, from which the finer elements have been eliminated by the struggles of the older generation. But no war—for all wars are ultimately an expression of the will to punishment,—would convince Germany of error; and the adverse criticism that veils a threat will stiffen her pride and increase her anger and resentment.

Moreover her chief fault is, as we should naturally expect it to be, the fault of her enemies also. National pride, egotism, self-seeking, however various their expression, are the dominating motives in every country of Europe. When the World-Economic Conference met last summer in London, its efforts produced no result, simply because the delegates, although they may have visualised a common purpose, dared make no personal sacrifice to obtain world-security. America was the most flagrant offender in this respect, but if the outstanding monetary difficulty with regard to the gold-standard could have been settled, no enduring benefit to the world at large would have been effected by the Conference. The Congress as a whole met to cure symptoms not the generative disease; and each country, when it came to matters of detail, was primarily concerned to protect its own interests. There was never from the beginning any evidence that the Representatives at the Conference were prepared to regard themselves as "members of one body" with a common purpose which could be served only by an earnest desire to free that world-body from its evil humours.

Therefore before we condemn Germany, we must be prepared to put our own houses in order, to ask ourselves whether we, also, do not suffer from a national selfishness which in similar circumstances might be intensified till it appeared as a form of madness? And let us go still further than that and ask whether, if such a thing were conceivable, any nation that found itself, after a candid examination, to be without fault would even then be in a position to judge and condemn another? It is certain that unless this stainless nation happened to be our own, we should be exceedingly loath to entrust it with the functions of an arbitrary judge.

Yet, although these statements may be acceptable to those who are able to realise the full implications of all that is meant by such a phrase as the Brotherhood of Man, they would be scorned by the politicians of any country in the world. To make a particular application, let us consider for a moment the use and intention of a phrase, once prominent as a slogan, and one that may very probably be revived in the course of the next year or two. This phrase is "The Mad Dog of Europe."

The intention is admirably clear or it would never have been accepted as a rallying call to the people. The plain intimation is that when a dog goes mad, there is no time to consider side-issues of any sort or kind, the thing is a public danger and must be killed at the earliest possible moment. But, like all such metaphors, it ignores every analogy except the obvious one.

In the first place it arrogates to the user the right of judgment. The madness in question appears so to us, it may be, solely because we are setting up a different standard of conduct as our criterion of sanity. To the German Nation of 1914, England's entry into the war appeared, also, as an act of madness? The description "a mad Englishman" is still current as an expression of European opinion on British mentality. Who, then, in international politics is to be trusted as a safe diagnostician of a nation's madness? It is obvious, in short, that the analogy is not a true one.

In the second place, must we not ask ourselves at the present time whether we may not have any responsibility for the state of mind which if aggravated may presently appear to us as madness? A bull, for example, may go mad when it is confined, and the confinement of Germany has been the prevailing policy of England and France since 1919. Yet those politicians of whom we spoke just now, would never dream of accepting any responsibility should the confined animal burst free and seek revenge on its gaolers. Once again the rallying call would go forth and we should be told that we have no time to consider who set fire to the house when our lives and property are in danger. Thus it is that the politicians and economists of Europe and America, concerned only with that shifting pattern which displays the immediate effects of their policies, plot their moves and counter-moves in the game that shall bring victory to one player at the expense of another. Incidentally that expense may include the suffering and desolation of many millions of people; but the cost is never counted until the end has been achieved.

Let us return, however, to this question of the world-sickness so many physicians are attempting to doctor, and try to understand something of the essential disease that is responsible for the symptoms. Politically and economically one primary cause of our illness is the generally accepted principle of retaliation which rules world politics.

Vithalbhai Patel:—Glowing tributes were paid to the late V. J. Patel by several speakers at a citizens' meeting called by the Sheriff and held at the Town Hall this evening. Mr. Bhulabhai Desai presiding, Mrs. Sarojini Naidu moved the resolution stating, "This meeting of the Citizens of Bombay mourns the irreparable loss the country has suffered by the death of Vithalbhai Patel, who, as the first Indian President of the Legislative Assembly, won the respect and admiration of all parties with his mastery of Constitutional Law and practice and who, as a great Indian leader lived a life dedicated to the National cause, and by his indomitable courage, steadfastness and spirit of sacrifice has left a precious memory to his country." Maulana Shaukat Ali seconded the resolution, which was supported by Dr. G. V. Deshmukh, Mr. M. C. Ohagla and several others. The meeting also resolved to perpetuate the memorial, and appointed a representative and influential committee to collect funds and to take necessary steps to have a memorial erected.

INDIAN NATIONAL SOCIAL CONFERENCE, 1933.

Mr. C. V. Krishnaswami Ayyar writes:—

It is some years since the Indian National Social Conference met and deliberated. During the interregnum the country has been undergoing rapid changes in spheres both of thought and of action. New social ideals have been contacted, and new hopes and ambitions are being entertained. The country as a whole has given proof that it is anxious to embark upon a period of active and intensive social reconstruction. In these circumstances the absence of Annual Social Conferences and of an organisation that can function as a Continuation Committee have been felt by many as a handicap. It has therefore been resolved to hold a session of the Indian National Social Conference this year in Madras on the 29th December 1933 immediately after the Indian National Liberal Federation.

An influential Committee has been formed with Mr. C. V. Krishnaswami Ayyar, Retired District Judge, Madras, as Chairman and Messrs. T. R. Venkatarama Sastri, M. Ramchandra Rao, O. Kandaswamy Chettiar, Mrs. Venkatasubba Rao, Mr. K. V. Sesha Aiyangar and others as members of the executive committee.

It is hoped that the Conference will be able to assess the new influences that are spreading through the country and that it will give the proper lead as to the attitude to be assumed by the country to these new influences. In view of the difficult times through which Indian Society is passing, in view of the magnitude and character of the social forces that are operating throughout the world, and in view of the uncertainty which surrounds their reactions in India, it will be realised that the present conference is one of importance.

It will also be realised that there is need to concentrate upon constructive voluntary effort with or without state aid in various fields of social work and to steadily educate public opinion so that it may function as an efficient instrument of the progressive social will.

May we request the public to extend its hearty co-operation to the organisers by sending as many delegates as possible.

Suggestions as to the best manner in which the objects of the Conference may be effectuated are invited and may be forwarded to Mr. K. V. Sesha Aiyangar, M. A., B. L., Joint Secretary, Indian National Social Conference 1933, Servants of India Society, Royapettah, Madras.

ALL-INDIA EDUCATIONAL CONFERENCE.

The ninth All-India Educational Conference of the All-India Federation of Teachers' Associations will be held at Karachi from 27th to 30th December, 1933. Dr. Sir Ross Masood, Vice-Chancellor, Muslim University, Aligarh, will preside. In addition to the general session the conference will meet in several sections. In the general session of the conference the following topics will be discussed: Creative education, co-education, curricula for girls' schools, teachers' rights and responsibilities, Education and the present problems in India, corporal punishment in schools, Education and unemployment.

In the Childhood Education Section there will be papers and discussions on 'Creative education for children', 'The Physical and Mental health of children', 'Practical and Artistic activities in schools' and 'Economic schemes for running nursery and kindergarten schools.'

The sectional meeting of the Vocational Education Section will be held under the presidency of Mr. N. S. Subba Rao, Director of Public Instruction, Bangalore. The following subjects will be discussed: (a) Vocational education as an aid to the removal of unemployment; (b) need for vocational training in the primary and secondary schools of India; (c) a two years' training course of Art and Craft Schools after passing the High School examination.

In the meetings of the Primary and Rural Education Section of the Conference discussion will be held on 'Curricula of study in our primary and Rural Schools', 'the duration of the preparatory, Lower Primary and Upper Primary Stages', 'Teachers and Rural Uplift', 'Co-ordination of Industrial education with teaching of the three R's' and 'Apathy of masses towards primary education and suggestions to remove it.'

Other sections of the Conference will devote themselves to Teachers' Training, Health and Physical Education, Experiment and Research, Moral and Religious education, Adult Education, Examination Enquiry, University Education and Secondary Education.

In conjunction with the Conference there will be an Educational Exhibition which will be opened on 26th December. The Exhibition will be open to the public. A Scout rally and physical culture display have also been arranged.

BARODA ORIENTAL CONFERENCE.

With the prospects of the seventh session of the Indian Oriental Conference, the 15th All-India Athletic Tournaments and the talks of a number of social functions in the air, the public of Baroda are looking forward to a busy week of entertainments during the ensuing Christmas holidays. Elaborate arrangements have been set on foot for the success of the Oriental Conference to be held on December 27, 28 and 29 under the patronage of His Highness the Maharaja Gaikwar.

Over 300 delegates and a large number of visitors are expected to assemble from all over India and abroad. Suitable accommodation for them all has been arranged. The services of a band of efficient volunteers, composed of college students and boy scouts, have been enlisted to meet the guests at the railway station and conduct them to their respective residences. For the convenience of the guests a well-equipped inquiry office will also be set up at a convenient place to furnish all requisite information.

In addition to the Central Committee of Management, presided over by Sir V. T. Krishnamachariar, the Dewan, and consisting of the Members of the State Government, the heads of Departments, the President of the Municipality and others as members, no less than ten sub-committees have been formed with a separate chairman and secretary each to help the general secretary.

The programme of the Conference, which will be presided over by Mr. Kashi Prasad Jayaswal, of Patna, includes among other items a dramatic representation of Kalidas' Sanskrit drama Mahavikramaditya, a Pandit Parishad and a Mushaira. The Conference will be inaugurated by His Highness the Maharaja on the afternoon of December 27, at the Nyaya Mandir Hall.

With the exception of the Pandit Parishad, which holds its session on the morning of December 28 at the Tarkeshwar temple, the various sectional meetings and the annual meetings of the linguistic and numismatic societies on the closing day are to be held at the Baroda Arts and Science College. Its Central hall will be utilised for lantern lectures for all the three days. There will be sports at the State Arena on the afternoon of December 28 and athletic sports on the morning of the 29th for the entertainment of the guests. An exhibition of rare specimens of oriental art, relics, manuscripts, fine arts, etc., will be held at the Museum and Picture Gallery at the Public Park. If sufficient numbers of delegates are forth-coming an excursion trip to Dwarka and Mount Abu will also be organised at the conclusion of the session.

THE COLONIZATION SCHEME.

The Jt. Hon. Secretaries of the Colonial Born and Settlers' Indian Association, send us the following :

"The Association will strenuously oppose the Colonization Scheme or any scheme that has for its object the reduction of our people in this country. South African born Indians and the permanent Indian Settlers have pronounced in no unmistakable terms their opposition to Repatriation, Assisted Emigration and to the Colonization Enquiry.

The constant cry of our people against the Government's restrictive legislative and administrative measures received the sympathy of the people of India and the Indian Government, and as a result when the Asiatic Areas Reservation Bill was on the anvil of the Union Government, a Delegation from India came out to help our people. Their intervention resulted in the Bill being shelved. But at what price. The price paid for the shelving of the Bill was the reduction of the Indian population to an 'irreducible minimum'. The Assisted Emigration Scheme was evolved by the Round Table Conference of 1927, which resulted in about 13,000 leaving those shores for good, the majority of them being South African Indians. But even the Cape Town Agreement did not prevent any further restrictive measures. One of those measures was the Asiatic Land Tenure Act of the Transvaal, which has become law despite the labours of the Indian Delegation.

In 1932 there came another Indian Delegation who, by agreeing to a Scheme of Colonization, have again resorted to the spirit of bargaining. For, what is the object of the Colonization Scheme, if not the reduction of our people. It would be seen therefore that on every occasion the Indian Government has had to pay a heavy price to obtain slight concessions for those who remain in this country.

The South African born Indians who form 85 per cent of the Indian population of South Africa and those who have made this country their permanent home, say that the time has arrived when they should assert their rights. If there is to be any bettering of their status, they state with emphasis, that it should be bettered without any spirit of bargaining.

A monster mass meeting held at the Durban Town Hall under the auspices of the Association expressed in no unmistakable terms against the present enquiry into a Colonization Scheme for Indians in South Africa. This was followed by meetings throughout Natal at which there was unanimous opposition to it.

Notwithstanding the stern opposition of the Indians to the Colonization Scheme, the South African Indian Congress which has now practically no following, is still, through its officials, persisting in co-operating with the Union Government in the enquiry.

Our Association has deputed Mr. P. B. Singh, who is now on his way to India where he will inform the people of India the stand of our Association has taken on the Colonization Scheme. He has also been asked to visit the Repatriates who have been sent out of South Africa.

We trust we have clearly stated our case against the Colonization Scheme.

NOTES

The Communal Tangle :—Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru made a speech in Benares University in which he denounced in vehement terms the Hindu Mahasabha. The President of the Mahasabha, Bhai Parmanand, in reply asked why the Pandit who was so hard on the Mahasabha for its communalism, had never raised his voice against the communalism of the Muslim League. The Pandit promptly responded by another speech or statement to the Press denouncing Muslim communalists. This brought one of these leaders, Sir Mahomed Iqbal, into the arena. He maintained that Muslims were willing to give up communalism and "become camp followers" of Hindus if their demands were acceded to and that they had made the offer to Gandhiji at the second Round Table Conference but that he had refused it because they would not oppose the demand of the Untouchables for separate electorates as he wanted them to do. Gandhiji is now concerning himself solely with the removal of Untouchability. But he could not sit quiet under this imputation which, moreover, had a bearing on the removal of Untouchability. He did not deny that he wanted the Muslim delegates to oppose the demand of the Untouchables but he brought out the fact that the Muslim delegation, though they were not prepared to oppose the Untouchables' demand for separate electorates—how could they having themselves secured separate electorates?—were ready to remain neutral and let Gandhiji and Dr. Ambedkar fight out the question. It is not an edifying episode on either side. It is not very safe for the depressed classes to become the earthen pippin between two iron pots. Out of this controversy, we are surprised to see emerge the general denunciation of communalism in the manifesto signed by Mrs. Sarojini Naidu and others, which is published in another column. Whether communalism is good or bad, the National Congress has accepted it and acted on it since 1916. Even the resolution of the Karachi Congress makes provisions for it. Why this sudden change of front now? The persons with whom Congress leaders negotiated and will be glad to come to a settlement, could not be called enemies of the country. One more observation. Pandit Jawaharlal's dislike of communalism is not limited to politics. It has its roots in religious disbelief. There are people who would prefer communalism if the alternative is a nationalism without religion.

Fascism or Communism? :—Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru has contradicted his reported statement to certain foreign press correspondents at Delhi that, as between the two, he was inclined towards Fascism. In view of the Pandit's previous declarations this seemed strange as we remarked last week. His repudiation of the Fascist preference imputed to him is definite and categorical. "I dislike Fascism intensely," he says, "and indeed do not think it is anything more than a crude and brutal effort of the present capitalist order to preserve itself at any cost." Pandit Jawaharlal occupies a responsible position in Indian public life and his words are likely to carry more weight than he probably intended them to, outside India. Signor Mussolini from the first has shown great regard for Indian culture and the Conference of Indian students to be held at Rome under his direction is the latest instance of his friendliness. It seems to us regrettable that a responsible Indian leader should go out of his way to cast aspersions on the Fascist movement on an obviously superficial view. Further, it is admitted by even those who share the Pandit's aversion to Fascism as a theory that the Fascist regime has raised Italy in ten years from collapse to the position of a great Power holding at the present moment the key to European peace. It has raised the condition of the peasants and labourers, too, which is the Pandit's own political objective. Communism has done the same in Russia and by methods not altogether dissimilar. Both have had to employ methods which were "crude and brutal" and it is a question whether Fascism or Communism went farther in this respect. India has an international responsibility which should not be prejudiced by hasty judgments of the policies of other nations in matters entirely within their competence.

The Setalvad Conference :—We print elsewhere a statement issued by the Secretary of the Bombay Presidency Association regarding the decision of a number of gentlemen who met last Wednesday to hold an All India Conference to express dissatisfaction at the contents of the White Paper on Indian constitutional reform and to suggest essential improvements in it. The meeting on Wednesday has been referred to as a Leaders' Conference, while the majority of those present like this writer cannot and do not wish to be known as leaders. There is so far as we know no section of Indian opinion which has accepted the White Paper and is prepared to support it without radical changes. The Secretary of State for India seems to think otherwise and the All India Conference will be able to disabuse him of this belief. If Sir Samuel Hoare is convinced that his scheme has no support from Indian opinion, even of the Moderate variety, and since it is opposed by a strong section in Parliament, he might decide to withdraw the scheme. He would be surprised to know how many people there are in India who would not very much regret it. The All India Conference cannot do anything more than bring home to the British Government that their scheme is unacceptable to India. The moment it steps out of this limit it will be wrecked on the rock of the Communal Award. If it survives this, it must infallibly collapse if the question of so-called "sanctions" is raised.

Missions and Untouchability :—Some days ago the Dnyanodaya naively asked why Christian Missions should not co-operate with Gandhiji's campaign against untouchability. We said that the obvious reason was that Missions wanted to convert people while the Servants of Untouchables Society is opposed to proselytism. The question was put to Gandhiji at Jubbulpore and his answer was that Missions could co-operate with the Society if they subordinated their aims to its, namely, the suppression and eradication of untouchability. "I invite the aid of agencies like yours in this work," he is reported to have said: "This is the right way. But there is also the wrong way. You may choose to work independently. You may have (in view) the conversion of Harijans to Christianity. You may see in the movement a chance for propaganda. If you work among the Harijans with such an aim, you can see that the very end we have in view will be frustrated. If you believe that Hinduism is a gift, not of God but of Satan quite clearly you cannot accept my terms. You and I would be dishonest if we did not make clear to one another what we stand for." To be just, there are very few Missionaries who now think that Hinduism is a gift of Satan. At the same time, they are far from convinced that it is the gift of God. If they were, there will, of course, be no reason for Missions. In this position, it will save much future misunderstanding and even bitterness if each went its own way. The experience of such alliances in the past has been far from happy. The "untouchables" also stand to gain by there being two parallel bodies working for their uplift.

Overdoing Cricket :—The Quadrangular Cricket matches which used to be played in Bombay had degenerated in to annual communal squabbles and many people were glad to see them abandoned. We had last week in Bombay a so called Test between a team of English players who had come all the way from England for no other purpose and one of Indians. We have not yet been able to ascertain what this was intended to "test." It has been a good test of the capacity of thousands of the Bombay public to enjoy the sight, without exerting themselves in any way for hours together. The Times of India was so carried away by its enthusiasm as to proclaim this match as a turning point in history. Others, including some Indians, think that the playing of the match would have an immediate influence on the White Paper scheme. A West Indian player called Constantine who seems to be a prominent figure in Test matches, has said that "Test cricket today is no sort of game. It is a battle." An opinion which has gained the support of another player, a South African called Bell. We are not against sports as a relaxation from the daily toil. But to make them the principal occupation of one's life is surely wanting in a sense of proportion. It must have been surprising to many to see thousands of people able to pay for their seats in this time of depressions. As for their employment, the employers including Government seem to have thought the witnessing of the match more important than getting through their normal business. Even offices which would refuse to give leave to a man to attend on his dying father, gave carte blanche to their employees to come or not as they like. We cannot say that we regard such enthusiasm for sport as a very healthy sign. Thoughtful men in England view with concern the place which games and doles have come to occupy in the national life. The importance of sports as providing a link between nations has often been exaggerated in the past. In view of the recent squabble between Australia and England arising out of the last Test matches between representative teams of these two countries, however, the argument can no longer be seriously advanced. At any rate India and England have already too many grounds of disagreement for us to risk adding one more.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, DECEMBER 23, 1933.

"INDIA MARCHES PAST."

On Friday last week one of the local newspapers published a message to the effect that the book "India Marches Past" by Mr. R. J. Minney was prohibited from being imported into this country. Next day, we bought a copy of it from a reputable firm of Bombay booksellers and publishers. The book is forbidden to be imported but there is no prohibition of the sale of the several scores of copies of it which were already imported and are lying on the hands of booksellers. This is one of the most glaring instances of the futility of these bans. The horse has usually been long stolen when the stable door is closed with a bang. This is not the worst of it. We had never heard of this book although it should have come to India several months back, seeing that it is stated to be the second impression; and we generally keep ourselves in touch with new books relating to India. But for the ban, in all probability we would not have gone to the expense (18 shillings) of buying this book whose intrinsic worth is less than that of waste paper. The book is a cross between the late Sir Valentine Chirol's quarter of a century old book on "Indian Unrest" and Miss Katherine Mayo's "Mother India." "India Marches Past" Mr. Minney's readers in a series of scenes adapted to the intelligence of the tourist who wants to taste the worst of every country which he passes through. The circumstances in which and the means by which, British rule was established and the basis on which it has all along rested in this country, are set forth with the detachment and insight of a historian in Seeley's "Expansion of England." To one who has read these essays, Mr. Minney's account must appear to be a silly joke. Even Mr. Valentine Chirol's book with its undoubted literary merit (which is entirely absent from Mr. Minney's book), in the light of subsequent events, seems a melancholy example of misused talents. Sir Valentine really wanted to help to create a good understanding between India and England. In many striking passages he deplored the growing estrangement, even at that time, between the two peoples and made suggestions to bridge the gulf. If Mr. Minney has any such intention, he has effectively concealed it. Miss Mayo also pleaded at different times different motives to account for her authorship of "Mother India". None of these was the vilification of the Indian people as an end in itself. This is apparently Mr. Minney's sole end in this as in his previous little book on "Shiva", one of the Hindu Trinity.

We do not care to follow the author in his pseudo-history which takes up more than one half of the book. The second part of the book is headed "Fetters". The first and greatest fetter, according to Mr. Minney is Hinduism the next is Sex, and the third is Ignorance. Here is a specimen of Mr. Minney's style and his resources of religious criticism. "As a God Shiva is rather a disreputable figure. He is himself a thief, a robber and a deceiver; and his passion for blood seems insatiable. At one time every rascal and murderer committed his vilest crime with Shiva's presumed benediction." Vishnu, the second of the Hindu Trinity, is fortunate enough to earn Mr. Minney's approbation. But his account of one of the Vaishnava sects is grossly libellous. He has generalised from what was exceptional even fifty years ago. His way of dealing with the Hindu Deity reminds us of an old orthodox Hindu's denunciation of the Christians' God as immoral, forgetful and bloodthirsty; immoral, because He begat a son on the wife of another man; forgetful, because He forgot in so doing one of His own commandments given to Moses; bloodthirsty, because He required the sacrifice of His only begotten son upon the Roman Cross as an expiation of the sins of men, born and unborn. If people read the Scriptures for the purpose solely of discrediting the religions of which they are exponents, they will get only a distorted conception like Mr. Minney of Shiva and the Hindu of the Christian God. How does the Thug's asking for the benediction of Shiva or Kali differ from the Churches' blessing the murderous operations of War? What did the Thugs do which Christians in the Great War did not do? The Christians did everything which the former did on a tremendously larger scale, it is true, but does that affect the moral issue? In addition, they carried on a propaganda now admitted to have been lying. In the matter of sex, we may remind Mr. Minney that the idea of Man as sex-centred is the latest contribution of Europe, while the East continues to cherish its old "superstition" that God is the centre of the Universe and of Man as a part of it. Mr. Minney, it need be hardly said, makes the most of the existence of Untouchables as a Hindu iniquity, enforcing his account with the parenthetical remark that "among the Untouchables are the loveliest women in India." But neither in his disquisition on this evil nor in his numerous denunciations of Gandhiji, does he refer even parenthetically to the Anti-Untouchability movement or to Gandhiji's efforts to rid Hindu society of this evil custom.

Mr. Minney devotes only a few pages of his book to Islam but even in that narrow compass he manages to display his crass ignorance of its contents. Contrasting it with Hinduism he says that "it lacks even the mysticism that many Western creeds possess." He has evidently never heard of the Sufis, for instance, who are not far apart from the Vedantists in the profundity and daring with which they seek to penetrate to the heart of the Universe. His references to the Arabian Prophet are not more complimentary than his characterisation of Shiva. Of the religion of Zoroaster, his idea is very simple. They (the Parsis), he writes, "form economically a formidable body for the essential of their creed is prosperity. No poverty is ever encouraged (sic) among them, for every Parsi provides through a committee for those financially embarrassed."

As for the third "Fetter" 'Ignorance', it is surely unjust to make Brahmans responsible for it while the British have been collecting and spending the taxes and administering the country for over a hundred and fifty years. To claim that all credit for what is good should go to the British and the discredit for all that is bad should go to Brahmans, is not fairplay—it is not "cricket."

He holds up as models for India to follow Japan, Kemalist Turkey and even Soviet Russia. He places the Emperor Aurangzèbe's attempt "to stamp out" Hinduism in this category. That it not only failed but broke up the Empire does not deter him from blaming the British Government for proclaiming the policy of religious neutrality. That is perhaps the chief reason of the belated ban on the importation into India of Mr. Minney's book.

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA.—XV.

HOMEWARD BOUND.

The Victoria after our experience of the Rex and the Bremen and the roomy railway carriages of America, shrunk to small dimensions. The decks and cabins felt inadequate and the portholes, little apertures. The bath rooms when closed became uncomfortably stuffy. The proprietors of the ship should really do something to improve the ventilation of the bath rooms. For all this, we were really glad to be once again on this beautiful ship and to tread again its familiar corridors. The company on board was an epitome of India as she should be. Hindus, Parsis, Muslims, Christians, men and women, politicians, businessmen, officials, students and gentlemen at large, all thrown together, comprised more than one half of the passengers. There was a Prince, too, a real, authentic one in the person of the Yuvaraj of Mysore. His Highness made himself as inconspicuous as he could in dress and deportment and moved familiarly among his fellow passengers and shared in their pastimes. He had for companion a high officer of the Mysore State, Mr. Ramiah, a hot-gospeller of optimism on an eliminative diet. His genial, energetic personality made him one of the centres of attraction during the voyage. It was a severe shock to learn of his sudden death of heart failure exactly a month after our landing.

There was a special vegetarian menu this time at all the meals. The Steward explained that this arrangement was made as there were several vegetarians among the passengers. In addition to this, the vegetarians had poories and bajyas frequently supplied to them by the bounty, as we learnt later, of Mr. Shantidas Askuran.

We were delighted to see, in the list of passengers the names of our very dear friends, Sir Akbar and Lady Hydarli. When people talk of the inherent antagonism between Muslims and Hindus, I always think of the intimate friendship which has subsisted between our families now over thirty years. When a grievous bereavement threw its dire shadow on our home, it was under the Hydaris' hospitable roof that we sought peace and rest and got them in overflowing measure. It is not as if Hydarli and I had no differences. Even in the boat, our discussions were sometimes prevented from wandering into controversial topics by the warning voice of Lady Hydarli who would bid us change the subject. The bonds which bind Hindus and Muslims together are strong enough to bear the heaviest strain. People who calculate upon the differences which are most prominent to the observer from outside, have a great disillusionment ahead of them. The existence of fundamental differences between Muslims and Hindus is all a myth. Women are the repositories of the deepest instincts of communities. Hindu and Muslim women have the same ideals, react identically to new influences and, wherever they have the opportunity, they always act together. That is why the Women's Movement in India has sternly set its face against communal principles being introduced in Women's Franchise. This, indeed, is the hope of India: the beam in darkness.

The ship stopped for a few hours at Naples. A large number of people crowded along the passage, several of them looking remarkably like, in dress and features, our Bandra Christians. They were Catholics. Having seen Vesuvius on our previous halt at Naples, we joined this time the excursion to the buried city of Pompeii. There are one or two coral factories on the way. Several of the articles made here are of very delicate workmanship. The lava from Vesuvius is also utilised in artistic ways. I bought a pair of sleeve links with a classic face from Pompeii carved in lava. It was a pretty little present but not, as it proved, very durable. We had a large company and a valuable guide to show us over Pompeii. The first thing that strikes an Indian here is the smallness of everything as compared with ancient ruins in his country. In an open letter to Ruskin published in his "Choice of Books", Frederic Harrison showed that praise of the past was often based on ignorance of facts. Among other proofs, he pointed out that the old armour in the Museums were found too small for the modern European. I was reminded of this when I saw the houses and halls so far as they are traceable amidst these ruins. The streets are as narrow as some of the oldest streets of Benares or the covered market at Shikarpur. They are made of hard stone leaving two ruts for the old Roman cars drawn by horses or oxen. There are baths—a favourite resort of the ancient Romans until they were converted to Christianity. There are theatres—one for tragedies, the other for comedies, the latter built, we were told, by the Emperor Philosopher, Marcus Aurelius. There are the temples to the Roman gods and goddesses. In one of them we were shown a beautiful bust with an open mouth as if in the act of speaking. The guide said that it was found that through a tube from below the priests used to give answers to questions which issued as oracles from this face. As we were going round, the guide stopped at one place and requested the ladies of the party to step on one side. We did not quite understand why he made this distinction until he explained that the next two rooms were to be seen by men only. Some women demurred to this departure from the single standard. An American couple had some discussion and I heard the husband tell his wife as he left her that "he will tell her all about it afterwards." I myself had some qualms about visiting these rooms as I hold as a general principle that what can not be seen by women should not be seen by men also. But with some hesitation I decided to visit this place as a piece of ancient history. These rooms would seem to have been intended as a resort for men and women who for reasons of their own could not meet in their respective homes. The bed rooms reminded me as nothing so much as the cells of the monks in the Kanheri and other Buddhist caves. But the attraction of these rooms was the pictures on the walls illustrating how ancient Roman men and women conducted themselves in their most intimate moments. The artistry was, of course, perfect; but there was little refinement or delicacy much less reticence in these figures. I was involuntarily reminded of Mr. Jamnadas Bajaj's public warning to the people of Puri two years ago that unless they made short work of "obscene" decorations on the walls and towers of the temple of Jagannath, they would not have the privilege of welcoming the National Congress. I wondered what he would have said to these Roman relics which are preserved and shown to tourists as curiosities, whereas no worshipper who goes to a Hindu temple thinks of inspecting the carvings on the walls and still less on those on the gopurams where they are invisible except through a telescope. The Portuguese Catholics in their religious frenzy mutilated the figures in the Elephanta caves but the Pompeii figures are left unmolested in the immediate vicinity of the Vatican.

We had intended this time to land at Port Said and see something of Cairo and the Sphinx and the Pyramids before joining the ship at Suez. But no arrangements could be made as the hours when the boat touched these parts were unsuitable.

In passing the Suez Canal the "Victoria" was frequently held up in order to allow not only mail steamers but even cargo ships to pass. There are what may be called "sidings" at frequent intervals where ships wait to make way for others, the Canal being too narrow for two ships to go abreast. The voyage through the Canal is always tedious. This time it was more so than usual. Then, the flies too made their appearance, sure harbingers of the East.

We stopped at Aden for a few hours. A radio from home welcoming us back. From then, there was no thought for anything but getting home as soon as possible. There was a mock trial of the Captain for making the passengers so comfortable during the voyage as to food, entertainments and so on, that several of them had put on weight. The indictment was carefully drawn up by Mr. T. K. Rajagopalan, Chief Auditor of the G. I. P. Railway. Sir Akbar Hydari presided with great solemnity over the trial and, acquitting the Captain of the offence, awarded him four bottles of the best champagne that could be had on board as compensation with the proviso that they should be opened only after the "Victoria" arrived safely at Ballard Pier!

At four in the morning I was up. The Bombay Light House was flashing in the distance. Next came the lights of the city. The Victoria slows down to take in the pilot. Now we are at the Pier. I am peering into the crowd to see Bhavani and Swaminath. But they were already in the ship and at my elbow, with my nephew, Bala, close behind.

THE COMMUNAL PROBLEM IN INDIA AND THE UNITED STATES.*

(BY K. NATARAJAN.)

What is known as the communal problem is just twenty-five years old. The ancient Hindus admitted newcomers through the land route into their fold. Greeks, Scythians and others were so admitted. The Maga Brahmins also called Saka-dvipa Brahmins, who are considered specialists in Astrology, and have their chief centre in Khunberia in the District of Midnapur, are descendants of Iranian missionaries. The Saka-dvipa Brahmins live in separate quarters in other cities also in Bengal. The caste system enabled the entrance of newcomers into the Hindu community without their having to renounce any of their old customs and practices.

Even this formality was dispensed with in the case of immigrants by the sea route. They did not become Hindus but remained outside the fold and continued to practise their own religion and social customs under the protection of Hindu rulers. Grants of land and privileges were conceded to them. The Jews who migrated to India after the destruction of the second Temple at Jerusalem, the Syrians in Travancore and the Parsis in Gujarat are prominent instances. It is not generally known that before Muslims came to India as invaders, close cultural and commercial contact existed between India and Arabia. The Arabs were honoured guests of the Rajahs of Malabar — so much so that one of the Zamorins ordered that one male member of every family in his realm should embrace Islam. Under this ancient system, people of diverse races and religions, and tribes and sects within the same religion, lived side by side as good neighbours participating in their joys and sorrows though marriages and family relations were confined to their own groups. The establishment of Muslim rule did not materially affect this modus vivendi. Muslim rulers very soon adopted this ancient national policy as their own; and, since the reign of Akbar, the Moghul Empire was accepted in the whole country as a national institution. The bigotry of Aurangzeb is usually believed to have broken with this policy and brought about the downfall of the Empire; but recent researches show that this view may have to be considerably modified. The traditional policy was followed in British India as a matter of course and up to a quarter of a century back there was no communal problem in this country.

Till twenty five years ago there was a single citizenship for all natives of India. It was embodied in the Queen's Proclamation in the declaration: "We declare it to be our royal will and pleasure that none be in any wise favoured, none molested or disquieted, by reason of their religious faith or observances, but that all alike shall enjoy the equal protection of the law." This basis of Indian citizenship was annulled by the declaration in 1906 of the late Lord Minto, the Viceroy of India, that "any electoral representation in India would be doomed to mischievous failure which aimed at granting a personal enfranchisement regardless of the beliefs and tradition of the communities composing the population of this continent." Its wisdom and justice apart, Lord Minto's declaration was a radical departure from the policy laid down in the Queen's Proclamation. There have been more communal conflicts during the last twenty five years than in the previous fifty years. During the last four or five years, they have extended to Indian States. The official view is that the prospect of the government of the country being transferred to Indians, is the main cause of the present acute Differences. The popular view is that the institution of separate electorates for Muslims in pursuance of the Minto declaration which made religious belief the measure of political rights, is the main cause. Anyhow, we have here the communal problem.

The situation in the States in respect of communal divisions may be indicated in a few words. The total population is about 120 millions. The cent per cent Americans, that is, the descendants of the first settlers, are about 47 millions. About 36 millions are composed of persons who were born in foreign lands or both or one of whose parents were foreign born. There are no statistics of the population whose grandparents or more remote ancestors immigrated to the States. There are 10 million Negroes. Before the great war, immigrants from European countries offered little resistance to Americanisation, though even then several groups clung to the culture and traditions and language of their native land. Since the War and due to the emphasis laid by the Versailles Treaty on the ethnic basis of nationalism, these European groups have become actively self-conscious. The Universities are responding to this new development by opening special German, Italian and other faculties. All citizens are equal in the eye of the law. They have the same rights and privileges, the same opportunities. Nevertheless there has not been a single Catholic, German or Italian elected to the presidency all these years. The political power is firmly held in the hands of the Anglo-Saxon element and the Irish. If the Indian policy were applied to the States, there would have to be reservations of seats according to population, if not separate electorates, for Negroes, and the score of other nationals who constitute the population. This may be a good thing in itself but the States will in that case be different from what they are now. In official and Anglo-Indian journalistic parlance, there are no Indians now; only Hindus, Sikhs, Mahomedans, Parsis and so on. It will be the same in similar conditions in America. America will cease to be a nation. She will become a geographical expression.

The American communal problem is more difficult and complex than the Indian. The minority communities of India have lived together for a thousand years. They have no other country to which they can look as their motherland. Their culture is predominantly Indian. Their spiritual home is India.* On the other hand, the American communities have lived together at the utmost for two centuries. They are drawn from lands which have their traditions, languages and cultures flourishing under their own national Governments in Europe. The relations between the nations of Europe tend to be reflected in the relations between the immigrant communities. There is constant commercial and cultural intercourse between the United States and the countries from which the immigrants come. The conditions of communal problem are thus more difficult in America notwithstanding that the European races, generally speaking, have adopted the economic as the ruling principle of life.

Let us now turn to the forces at work to solve the problem. In India Government even if it were anxious is without the power of promoting unity.

* The late Maulana Mahawad Ali who was buried at the mosque in Jerusalem as he wished, is an exceptional case. The vast majority would wish, like Vithalbhai Patel, to have their remains deposited in India, if they happen to die in a foreign land.

Having its centre far from the scene of administration its very efforts to smooth differences often tend to accentuate them. The deficiencies of Government are not made good by private action, because each community is absorbed in its own affairs and there are few men and women in any of them who take a rational view of the communal problem. There is a school which denounces communalism as an unmitigated evil. Its influence is bound to be slight because the vast mass of the population regards its community as its greatest protector. The other school is unable to look beyond the community to the country, or else it believes that it is serving the country by serving its community. In the United States, the situation is entirely reversed. The State recognises no religious or communal differences. It gives equal rights to all. It favours none on account of historic importance or martial qualities. Every community knows that its position depends entirely on its own contributions to the common well being and exerts itself to make it as large as possible. The English language accepted by all as the language of the country and the nation, is the language of political freedom. There are also a considerable number of influential men and women who are engaged in social work extending to all communities and calculated to create the sense of common citizenship among them.

We, too, in India are not without gleams of light. The younger generation and the women of all communities intensely dislike communal rivalries and wish to work as one people for the good and greatness of the country. The Bombay International Fellowship is itself engaged in the same national service.

ABOLISH CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

(BY MARGARET E. COUSINS)

The newspapers report that the British people are in a state of concern because a man was hanged by mistake in the Lahore jails. The Indian people in whose blood is the belief in "Ahimsa", in whose philosophy is the belief in the sanctity of life, are still more shocked and concerned. The incident is appalling to contemplate. But, is not the whole subject of legalised murder by hanging still more thrown into prominence by the possibilities of the occurrence of such mistakes? Is hanging necessary at all? Is not the death penalty an evidence of barbarity and revenge? Is it useful even as a deterrent? Does India want to continue it?

My recent experience of the system of legalised murder has branded the horror, the shame, the uselessness of it into my soul, and the risk of mistake in it. The group of Civil Disobedience prisoners in the Women's Jail in Vellore lived in cells in the same line as the small block called "the condemned cells." For almost three months one young woman of about twenty-two years old was in one of those cells under sentence of hanging while she awaited results of appeals she made to three high authorities for the commutation of her sentence. She made a favourable impression on all who saw her or talked to her. She denied her guilt. But her appeals were not granted. We knew the night before that she was to be choked out of existence the next morning in the presence of the staff. There is a telepathy in jail, as in all parts of India, despite all precautions of administrative secrecy. We knew that she was perfectly calm and brave as she walked to the gallows and that her last words were her affirmation of her innocence and her belief that God would punish the guilty person. The existence of a system of punishment which allows no chance of life to such a person is self-condemned. All that day, and for days afterwards, I went about in shame. I felt that our social system had degraded everyone of us in being a party to such a brutal, disgusting murder in cold blood, and with official ceremonial. We were shocked beyond measure and awakened out of our ignorance and thoughtlessness about the system of capital punishment, which the public is party to as long as it does not agitate for its abolition.

There is a great duty laid on intelligent political prisoners who have first-hand experience of this horror of hanging in the Men's and Women's Jails in all Provinces to lead a movement for the removal of the death penalty from the law of this land.

It was with deep happiness that I saw in the newspaper some weeks later that Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh has introduced a Bill in the Assembly to abolish capital punishment, which is now awaiting ballot opportunity for discussion. Belgium, Denmark, Holland, Italy, Norway, Portugal, Sweden, and some of the States in America have abolished the death penalty. They have found no increase in crime as a result.

Last year the Maharaja of Nepal announced by Proclamation that capital punishment would not be inflicted for an experimental period of five years as it was entirely repugnant to Indian ideals. Thus one Indian State has already set a precedent for the rest of the country. Lord Buckmaster, Ex-Lord Chancellor of England, is one of these who has rooted opposition to capital punishment. He is not satisfied as to its being a deterrent. The opinion of a man of such experience should weigh for much.

Our experience in jail showed us that the "life sentences" to which a death sentence had been commuted had always resulted in good. There were over fifty such "lifers" in Vellore and they were the finest citizens of the Jail. The long term which usually works out to about fifteen years gives them opportunities of rising in positions of responsibility.

Human beings have no right to take life. It is illogical for the law to enunciate this principle and then order its own minions to do the very thing it condemns. Often innocent people are hanged and there is no reparation. The whole process of the hanging or electrocution is degrading and demoralising to the executioner, the jail superintendents, the jail doctors, men and women and jail staffs of jailors, warders, matrons and wardresses. It deprives the culprit of all opportunity of improvement, and we have seen how men and women make good when given time and disciplinary circumstances, for their crimes had been due to passionate frenzy, or lack of realisation, or pressure of intolerable circumstances, rather than sheer evil of nature. No man or woman should be deprived of the chance of making good. The harshness of the death penalty coarsens public sentiment also, and is but a relic of an age of barbarity.

This is a moment in which the public of India should raise its voice in support of Mr. Gaya Prasad Singh's Bill. Resolutions should be passed at all the Social Reform Conferences now being arranged, at the Women's Conferences and at public meetings people should call on their representatives in the Assembly to vote for the Bill and those who have been in jail when an execution took place and who have been awakened to its degradation of the whole human society should be in the forefront of the agitation for the abolition of legal hanging in this country.

THE REVOLT.

(BY H. P. DASTUR.)

[All words in doub's inverted commas are quotations from Tagore's poem 'The Beginning']

The world is in the grip of a revolt. In the midst of its heat and chaos stands man, sweating, swearing, and like an animal at bay, gnashing his teeth at all and sundry. On its brink sits woman, wondering, weeping, and like an imprisoned angel, praying for the welfare of her mad child. And over such darkness of the world's black night a poet, like a messenger from Heaven, drops a beautiful soft light,—a melodious pen-picture of baby spirit. The baby asks the woman, "Where do I come from, where did you pick me up?"

She answers, "You were hidden in my heart as its desire, my darling."

But man, modern man of machine-made age, what need has he of poetry either of words or of motherhood. He says, no. Baby shall be picked up, says he, from its specified pigeon-hole in his mechanic shop of birth-control with its proper number and correct time broadly labelled on its front and back.

The man snarls, the woman sighs, the baby cries, and the revolt spreads on and on.

"You were," continues the woman, "in the dolls of my childhood's games; and when with clay I made the image of my god every morning, I made and unmade you then."

But to man all these are silly sentimentalities. While she sits, he argues, playing her games and making images, he has to find food for them all. He decides she shall make no other images than what he may allow.

"You were enshrined," goes on the woman, "with our household deity, in his worship I worshipped you. In all my hopes and my loves, in my life, in the life of my mother you have lived. In the lap of the deathless spirit who rules our home you have been nursed for ages."

But, says man, if he too is to waste time in worship who is to attend to all his countless machines, rich products of his high intellect, at once the strength and wonder of his glorious civilization? All his hopes, all his loves, all his life, the life of all his ancestors have striven hard to gain over-lordship of the world. He swears by all the tin-gods that his machines can make that he will hold on to it at any cost.

The man snarls, the woman sighs, the baby cries, and the revolt grows fiercer still.

"When in girlhood," says the woman, "my heart, was opening its petals, you hovered as a fragrance about it. Your tender softness bloomed in my youthful limbs, like a glow in the sky before the sunrise. As I gaze in your face, mystery overwhelms me; you who belong to all have become mine. For fear of losing you I hold you tight to my breast. What magic has snared the world's treasure in these slender arms of mine?"

But man feels that at the zenith of the glory of his civilization, these baby-brats hover about it as a nuisance, and woman's hysteria fits cloud the sunshine of its greatness. From the high pedestal of his material success, as he gazes down on her, his most favourite slave and most wanted, doubts assail his power-intoxicated brain. He so fears he may lose her, his most precious possession, his greatest pleasure. And so, while his artful hypocrisy eloquently pretends to be ardently wanting to liberate her from an age-long slavery, his insatiate lust and its godless creed stealthily tighten their stranglehold on her with the help of the barren mechanics of birth-control.

The man snarls, the woman sighs, the baby ories and the revolt grows so terrific, in its lurid-red heat man's whole civilization melts down, and like a molten lava rolls down the valley of retribution, threatening to devour man himself. Man flees for his very life. At the brink he meets woman. For sheer safety he runs into her open arms. 'My child,' she ories, hugging him close to her bruised heart, 'my lost child come back to me.' And while her torn breasts make a pillow of peace for his feverstricken head, her now liberated soul sends up a prayer of thanksgiving. She forgives him, forgives him all, forgives him completely. What else can a mother do. A sick child, she argues, needs more mothering not less.

Her forgiveness is his deliverance and baby's joy. The revolt ceases, and from its fertile ashes a new humanity springs up to people the world with the poet's baby-spirit.

CHINA TODAY.*

(BY DR. Y. Y. TSEU.)

We are in the midst of another period of intercultural contact of China and the outside world. Once more her civilisation is in a state of flux. Thought patterns, modes of living, time-honoured traditions and institutions, all are under-going far-reaching transformation. Changes in the form of government, momentous as they may be, are accompanied by more fundamental changes in ideology, in the outlook on life, and in intangible realities, such as tastes and standards, beliefs and loyalties, which make up the spirit of a new age.

The present period of intercultural contact began in the middle of last century. The leading industrial nations of the West were then looking for foreign markets to absorb the output of their factories; and as Asiatic countries were unindustrialized, both diplomatic and forceful means were used to open up these countries to foreign trade. Because of lack of modern scientific and technical knowledge, the Chinese were placed at a disadvantage in these political and economic relations, and to remedy the situation, the government took steps to encourage the study of foreign languages, translation of scientific books, sending of students abroad, and employment of foreign experts.

The main trend of thought in China today is realistic, scientific, and humanistic, with emphasis on the social objective, "the greatest happiness of the greatest number." As to philosophy, in the proper sense of the word, sufficient time has not elapsed for any new system to appear. Principal attention is given to a reinterpretation of the traditional schools of thought—Confucianist, Taoist, Buddhist—in the light of the new knowledge that has come from the West. Between the traditional schools of thought and the infiltration of Western philosophical ideas, certain significant tendencies may be noted. Reference has been made to the emphasis on the scientific method, or the emphasis on what is factual, which means first-hand knowledge as contrasted with book learning or mere speculation. This note is not entirely new; Yen Shi-Chai (1635-1704) long ago had sounded it.

Confidence in science has become an all-absorbing faith. Science is looked upon as the magic key that will ultimately open all doors of knowledge, solve all mysteries of the universe, and eliminate all the ills of life. William James somewhere in his writing referred to the dogmatic attitude of undergraduates about the omnipotence of science, so that to stop an argument all that was necessary was to call a man unscientific. Such an attitude prevails in China at present. An eminent thinker once publicly stated that philosophy was poor science, and theology, poor philosophy—a statement reminiscent of Auguste Comte's three stages of intellectual progress.

The assumed supremacy of science raised the question of the relative position of science and philosophy in the business of living. In 1928 a heated public debate was launched in the press; a dozen well-known writers and thinkers took part in it. It started with a lecture on the philosophy of life by Carson Chang, professor of philosophy at Yenching University, who maintained that, as science dealt with the objective world and with uniformities and averages whereas a man's philosophy of life was subjective, volitional, and individualistic, it was a sphere in which science could play but a small part, in which, however, personal influence and choice counted most. China's philosophers, from Confucius and Mencius down to the rationalists of the Sung, Yuan, and Ming dynasties, had emphasised this discipline of the inner life, and the result was a spiritual civilization. Europe, during the past three hundred years, had emphasized man's control of nature; the result was a materialistic civilization, which culminated in the catastrophic world war. China was at the fork in the road; she would have to choose which way to go; the key to the situation was an adequate philosophy of life.

This depreciation of science was strongly objected to by Dr. V. K. Ting, eminent geologist, who regarded Chang's thesis as a revival of medieval metaphysics. He considered the pursuit of science an excellent means of self-discipline; according to him, it would not only break down prejudices, but also create a love of truth; it would inculcate a calm and balanced attitude, and develop one's intellectual powers. Only by understanding biology and psychology could a man really know the meaning of life. Such appreciation of life could be acquired only by those who had looked through the telescope and realized the vastness of the universe, and through the microscope and realized the minuteness of life, but is denied to those who merely indulge in vacuous contemplation. Chang countered by saying that science is only one of several avenues leading to truth and that there are spheres into which it is incompetent to enter; a scientific analysis would be meaningless in an experience of the beauty of a sunset. Liang Chieh-chao showed that the truth of the matter probably lay somewhere between the two opposing views by pointing out that "a large part of the problem of life should be and can be solved by science, but that a small portion and a more important one is beyond science. Human life cannot separate itself from the intellect, but the intellect cannot embrace the whole of life."

When these discussions were collected in one volume, Hu Shih was asked to write an introduction. As was to be expected of one who considered Huxley and Dewey his best teachers, he threw his weight on the side of the scientists and expounded his "naturalistic view of life." In this naturalistic scheme of life, with its doctrine of spontaneous evolution, religion as supernaturalism has no permanent place. At best it is a passing phase in man's arduous upward climb; at worst, it is a positive hindrance to progress. This does not mean that Chinese scholars find no interest in the study of religion as a phenomenon in social evolution; in fact, recent archeological and ethnological studies have greatly increased our knowledge of the religious ideas and practices of past generations, as, for instance the discovery of the oracle bones at An-yang left by the people of Yin. But as a factor in social progress, religion has outlived its usefulness to most Chinese thinkers, a view quite in keeping with the humanistic tendency in Confucianism.

T'sai Yuan-pei once proposed to substitute aesthetics for religion as a means for the enrichment of life. He thought that aesthetics had all the advantages of religion in adding to the zest, colour, and sweetness of life, without any of the drawbacks, such as the deceptive notion of a deity and the spirit of intolerance which religion generally fosters. According to him "beauty is universal; it cannot be privately appropriated; it can be shared by all without being denied to any one. It brings people together instead of dividing them. Its influence is not only cultural, but also ethical; it cultivates tolerance and cures selfish acquisitiveness." This position is challenged by others, who grant that there is much in common between religion and art maintain that there is a fundamental difference between the two in that religion deals with the ethical life and carries an imperative "Thou shalt," whereas art involves no ethical necessity and is a matter of individual taste which varies with the degree of intelligence. To put it briefly, art aims at expression, but religion aims at salvation.

In place of religious faith, there is among our people a sense of collective responsibility which almost amounts to a social religion. Its basis is to be found in the cult of ancestor worship. While religious creeds teach the immortality of the individual soul, ancestor worship emphasizes the immortality of the group, like drops of water merged in a vast stream flowing continuously onward. This is a popular idea among our people. Liang Chi-ch'ao in an essay "My View of Life and Death," wrote "We all die and we do not die; what dies is our individual self; what does not die is our social or collective self." This social religion has driven scholars like Chen Tu-siu and others from the seclusion and detachment of the school-room to turn to the turbulent life of active politics and even radical agitation for social justice. Not a few despairing of the present social order have embraced more radical schemes such as offering a way of securing not only consistency in individual living, but also welfare for the masses. This social passion is a distinct note in modern Chinese literature.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE NAZI MOVEMENT, *

(By DR. HEINZ NIETZSCHKE.)

The German national socialist movement has a long history, and its revolution is not a very sudden and unexpected one. The principles and ideas of almost all German movement and thinkers of the last 150 years entered into the philosophy of the National socialism. Its philosophy wants to return to the vital human fundamentals: to love, sacrifice, service. Therefore the main characteristics of this philosophy are the strong accentuation of the nations as one of the highest values, and the struggle against every kind of individualism. "The benefit of all is above the benefit to the individual." The nation is not only a sum of individuals, but something more, something higher, an entity. The individual has to sacrifice himself in service for his country. Obedience to a strong, socially minded authority hard work, strict family discipline, chastity, self-denial, thrift, sobriety, leadership; these are the fundamental principles of new morals. Connected with that is a strong accentuation of the health of the people and of the preservation and furtherance of the peasantry. Only nature and civilisation combined are real culture. If the German forgets to love the soil of his country German culture must go to ruin. It is thus seen that the national socialist movement is more than a party, even more than a political movement. It is a total movement which must require a total revolution. It cannot stop at a change of the political conditions.

Therefore at the very beginning of the German Revolution, changes took place in the realm of cultural and social life. And since that time such changes have played a very important part in the process of re-birth of the German nation.

One cannot say very much about it since all the changes are still in process. But just a few words may give some idea. Labour is considered as a duty and an honour for every citizen, be he a workman with the hands or with the brain. There shall be no advantage of birth and education. Every citizen is a "worker". In this respect the first of May was very significant. This day was celebrated as a festival of labour. For the first time all the people in the village marched together to the village square—peasant, independent farmer, schoolmaster, merchant, labourer, doctor, minister. The German woman is exhorted not to copy degenerate habits from abroad, not to smoke, but to wear simple clothes and to live a simple, healthy and natural way. Libraries are being cleared of "trash" literature. Night-clubs are being closed. Art is getting a new meaning. One tries to build up a new art, a German art which takes root in the soul of the nation, and is the artistic expression of the ideas and ideals of this people. In order to make it clear what I mean, I beg to refer to your poet, Rabindranath Tagore is such a national poet in the highest sense of the word. As a founder of a school and as a teacher he lives among his fellow countrymen, with them and for them. His poems and his philosophy are the expression of the Indian nation. Art in New Germany means the struggle against every kind of abstract and so-called international art. In the theatres the German classics are being brought forth again. Old poets are being rediscovered. Jazz is being replaced by German music. Dancing is being modified. Art in the handicrafts is being rediscovered. Even the conception of science is changing. Knowledge and schooling are no longer considered as ends in themselves, but as means towards producing a worthier Germany of the future. Incisive changes have already taken place in the field of education. New types of educational institutions are arising: schools for the leaders of the so-called Hitler Youth, the present youth movement in Germany, schools for farmers, schools for labourers, schools for Hitler's storm troopers. But also the ordinary school system is getting new impulses. The future education shall have a new and general ideal of education. The German youth has chiefly to be educated to simplicity and to loyalty and pride in his German race. That means a stronger accentuation of character education, race education, and physical education in all kinds of schools. Beside this it is necessary to stress the German lesson: German history, German literature, language, art, folklore, and a greater accentuation of the old German history.

Also the German university has to get a new idea of higher education, or better, it has to get an ideal whereas there was no clear ideal of higher education whatever since some decades. This new ideal is the political student in the platonic sense of the word. Being politically minded means being anxious for the inner life of the union. It means that every student has to study in service for his state. And some proposals are being made: (1) that every student shall go into a labour camp for one year; (2) that he shall pass a political semester during his study; (3) that he shall live in so-called "houses of comradeship" for two years to foster and to strengthen comrade-like spirit, discipline, and obedience. These houses are something like student hostels, but with an outspoken educational purpose.

To some extent Hitler's storm trooper who has fought with him and for him in the political battles for the last 12 years, is such a new ideal of education. He always lives in service for his fatherland. And he wears his uniform, not because he wants to march into a new war, but because it belongs to the ideal of a severe, simple, and decent life of a new generation.

In other words: The change in Germany is not only a change of institutions, but also of the whole mental attitude. This gives the German revolution its far-reaching meaning which ought to interest other nations.

It is obvious that such a total revolution cannot be finished in a few months. For that purpose years, decades, perhaps a century is necessary. For, the modern civilization is too complex. Furthermore, the intellectual chaos of our age is too great and not really comparable with any of the crises of earlier transitional epochs. It even may be that the total change in Germany would take place a little too quickly. For there is an ardent longing among Germans for an universal culture which in the western world is still lacking since the end of the Middle Ages.

INDIANS ON BRITISH BOATS.*

Sir,—May I in the interests of Indo-British relationships, and incidentally of British shipping itself, bring the following matter to your notice? The number of Indians who are travelling between India and Europe on the Continental lines is very much on the increase. If it were not for the special concession to students which the P & O and its subsidiary companies grant, I wonder how many Indians of that type would travel by the British lines.

I am not concerned about the senior men like the Round Tablers and Princes who travel between India and Europe in special cabins and under the shelter and social protection of the Government of India and the India Office, for they must not be bullied. But I am concerned about the large number of students who travel either Second or Tourist. They present a very serious problem.

The general tenor of the experience of the students on the voyage from Bombay to Tilbury is that their presence is not acceptable to their fellow passengers. Cases of gross incivility and downright rudeness are by no means infrequent. While on the way out matters are worse. I am told, and I hope sincerely that my information is correct, that the P & O have advised their Captains to see to it that the Indians are in no way harassed, or rudely treated, or kept out of games when they are coming over to this country. When incidents of incivility have been brought to the notice of the captains they have taken steps to put matters right. Many Indians think it against their self-respect to make complaints and brood over their unfortunate experience. But after all what can the captain of a boat or the directors of companies do in the matter of subtle pinpricks which hurt and leave scars behind? If the British boats are ultimately boycotted by Indians—and I can assure you that such propaganda is being carried on now—in spite of the very attractive terms which the companies offer, the blame will lie not on the companies but upon the rank and file of British passengers. Many Indians feel that it is better to maintain self-respect than take advantage of an attractive offer.

Why, for instance, must there be segregation at meal times? Granted that some Indians want to have a party of their own, and likewise that the British want to be with their own particular friends at a table, there are many others who would like to mix and sit at a common table with the British. But the atmosphere of the boat does not allow of such a step. Why do some of the British, more often than not, get up and walk away if an Indian happens to sit on the same sofa or in a chair near to them in the lounge or the smoke room? Why must a Frenchwoman who only very recently boarded a boat at Port Said be told that she must not talk to the Indians or discuss her paintings of oriental scenes with them or sit at their table as she would be letting down "white prestige"? Why do British passengers quite gladly fraternize with the Indians on the Continental lines where no discrimination is either allowed or tolerated, when those very people would be aloof and even overbearing when the Union Jack flies over a steamer?

Allowing for individual fads and fancies and other psychological complications, and avoiding generalization from a very enormous number of "solitary instances," the broad fact remains that the Indians generally find the atmosphere on an English boat less conducive to happiness than on an Italian one. Perhaps the exception on the British side can be made in the case of those lines which run the "one class" boats and depend for their business on the satisfaction of the passengers. It is strange how the Britishers who travel by these lines are quite friendly and get on very well with their fellow-passengers.

I am constrained to write this letter as a result of several complaints which have come to my notice not only lately but during the last several years. An unnecessary and unfortunate bitterness against Britain is being created in many hearts, and men are being led to say that like the Japanese and the Chinese we must become an independent people. No one would then dare to be rude to us on the boats. We are peculiarly responsive to acts of courtesy, as the best type of Britishers with Indian experience can testify.

I wish that the remarkable courtesy and overpowering and even embarrassing kindness which I have met with personally in this country could in some measure be passed on to those Britishers who are going out to India in various capacities. What a difference it would make in the whole relationship of our two countries. The silken cords of love and friendship are a much stronger link than the iron chains of a forced and false prestige.—I am, Sir, &c.

Execution of Prisoners.—A communique says:—Following an enquiry by a responsible officer with the object of fixing the blame for the premature execution of a condemned prisoner in the Lahore central jail on Nov. 21 last the Governor in Council has come to the conclusion that the primary cause of the mistake was the fact that the envelope containing the orders for postponement of the execution did not bear any indication of its urgent nature. Disciplinary action is being taken against two secretariat officials responsible for this grave omission, and stringent orders are being issued to prevent its recurrence as far as this is possible.

INDIA AND ITALY.

A conference of Indian and other Oriental students in Europe, the first of its kind, will be held in Rome, on December 21. The conference is organised by the provisional committee of the Institute of Indian and Oriental Arts which will be officially opened by Signor Mussolini. The Indian and Oriental student delegates will also be officially received by Signor Mussolini at the Grand Opera, Rome when there will be a special performance in honour of their visit. After the conference the student delegates will travel all over Italy in a special train, arranged by the State, for sight-seeing. Mr. Amiya Sarkar, an Indian student who is now in Rome (a nephew of Sir Jadu Nath Sarker, former Vice-Chancellor of the Calcutta University) and who is one of the organisers of the Institute of Indian and Oriental Arts, has been elected provisionally the Secretary of the Conference. Mr. G. Mukherji, a London-Indian student has been entrusted to organise the Indian and oriental students delegation from British Universities.

TIBET AND NEPAL.

Interesting views regarding the civilization of culture of Tibet and Nepal were expressed in a press interview by His Excellency Carlo Formichi, vice-president of the Royal Academy of Italy and His Excellency Giuseppe Tucci, a member of the Royal Academy of Italy. They have just returned from Nepal en route for Bombay, where they will embark on the CONTE ROSSO.

Describing the success that attended the expedition and the material they have collected they said the difficulty which Western people feel in understanding the Eastern mind is they do not try to assimilate Eastern thought but merely try technically to interpret it.

According to these scholars India, Tibet and Nepal are as much a spiritual reality to-day as they ever were before. Whereas Western people get confused about the thousands of gods and goddesses to be found in India these to Eastern people merely represent symbols in human expression, through which the human mind progresses towards a wider understanding of itself and of the universe.

Describing their impressions of the countries visited Sgr. Carlo Formichi said that he was extremely charmed with Nepal. This country preserved in its real purity Hindu life and Hindu art. What Hindu society was a thousand years ago could be seen in Nepal to-day untouched by foreign influences. He was also very much struck with the hospitality of the people, with their peaceful life and with the ordered state of their society.

As regards Tibet Sgr. Tucci said that this country had benefited definitely through Hindu influence. Formerly the Tibetans may have been man-eaters, but now they are the most spiritually strong people. They are very happy in their loneliness, and their whole life is religious in its entire conception, religious not in the modern sense of prayer, but in their entire make-up. They derive pleasure more from within than from without.

He visited Tabo Rabgyeling and Toling, where great Buddhist monasteries are to be found. There he studied Buddhist writings, and has brought away with him 3,000 manuscripts. Some of the old writings which had been lost in India are still preserved in Tibet, and the Tibetans have written huge commentaries on them, so that the original meaning of those manuscripts is available.

Another proof of Indian influences in Tibet was the presence of frescoes depicting Indian life and art.

These were photographed by Sgr. Tucci, who fears that if the buildings are not looked after the ceiling might give way, and one of the best treasures of Indo-Tibetan art be lost to the world.

He thinks these frescoes are the work of those artists who left India after the Muslim invasion, and that they are of such supreme importance that he hopes the British Government will approach the Tibetan Government with a view to preserving them.

In Nepal, too, they found very valuable Sanskrit manuscripts which they photographed and are carrying with them to Italy.

Asked what was the essential difference between Eastern and Western religion, Sgr. Tucci said that whereas in Hinduism and Buddhism no particular door to evolution was prescribed, the West provided one specific door for religious experience.

A PROTEST AGAINST COMMUNALISM.

The following manifesto has been issued by Bombay citizens :—

It has long been a painfully obvious fact to all dispassionate observers that those organisations which claim to protect the separate interests of communities divided by religion serve only the self interest of small coteries of exploiters of the religious sentiments of their fellowmen.

They have in the last few years set up artificial barriers against the attainment of national unity. They have encouraged a narrow sectarianism and intolerance which finds frequent expression in riots, and leaves a continuing trail of hatred and rancour. And they have been attempting to release such anti-social forces as would make any attempt at a wider synthesis of human culture ineffective.

It has been our hope that these symptoms are but the passing and irrelevant phases of a new age struggling to be born. We have remained confident that in spite of the disruptive elements introduced into our body politic, the inherent social affinities cannot long remain obscured from the public mind. And in the expectation of this sanity asserting itself, we have been content to remain indifferent to the antics of these communal agitators who strut in the pompous authority of artificially incubated organisations.

But recently there has been a coalescing of reactionary forces, a defining of new and vicious attitudes and the development of fresh and dangerous approaches, to communal agitation that compel us to express our open abhorrence of such methods. And we congratulate Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru on the courageous lead he has given in the matter. We agree with him, that all such as in the name of religion, caste or community hold unholy truck with the enemies of Indian freedom have to be opposed and fought. And we assure Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru of our support in his war against the blind and rabid communalists in this country.

The following are the signatories of the manifesto: Mrs. Sarojini Naidu, Messrs. K. F. Nariman, Bhulabhai J. Desai, K. M. Munshi, S. A. Brelvi, Mrs. Perin D. S. Captain, Messrs. G. V. Deshmukh, A. S. ALL PARTIES CONFERENCE IN BOMBAY.

After prolonged discussion, representatives of different political parties in the Presidency, who met on Wednesday evening in the hall of the Bombay Presidency Association, Esplanade Road, Bombay, resolved to convene an all-India conference in the city to express disapproval of the proposals contained in the White Paper, and to formulate essential modifications. About 85 gentlemen were present at the informal meeting which was presided over by Sir Chimanlal Setalvad. It appears that although invitations had been issued to some of the prominent Congressmen, they did not attend for some reason or other. Some of them, however, addressed letters to the conveners sympathising with the object of the meeting, which was to consider what steps should be taken to make clear the dissatisfaction of the country with the White Paper proposals.

It is learnt that Sir Chimanlal stressed the necessity for holding a conference of representatives of all parties to protest against the White Paper proposals, as revealed in the evidence of Sir Samuel Hoare, the Secretary of State for India, before the Joint Parliamentary Committee. He could not understand why the Indian delegates did not cross-examine the Secretary of State on certain points affecting the best interests of the country.

A discussion then followed. Some advocated country-wide agitation before the report of the Joint Parliamentary Committee was out, while others pointed out that in the event of their modifications being turned down, they should be prepared to take united action.

Eventually, however, it was resolved to issue a statement over the signatures of those present at the meeting, calling an "All-India Conference in Bombay to make it clear to the British Government and Parliament that the White Paper proposals with their implications, as revealed in the examination of the Secretary of State, before the Joint Parliamentary Committee, do not satisfy the country, and to formulate essential modifications."

The statement was signed amongst others by Sir Chimanlal Setalvad, Sir Govindrao Pradhan, Mr. B. S. Kamat, Mr. Meyer Nissim, Mr. M. C. Chagla, Mr. J. B. Petit, Mr. D. V. Gokhale, Mr. V. N. Deshpande, Professor D. G. Karve, Mr. N. R. Wadia, Mr. D. G. Dalvi, Mr. Jannadas Mehta, Mr. R. R. Bakhle, Mr. P. Kodanda Rao, Mr. K. Natarajan and Dr. G. V. Deshmukh.

The meeting also appointed an executive committee with power to co-opt, under the auspices of the Bombay Presidency Association, to give effect to the aforesaid resolution and to work out the details.

Multan Sweepers' Demands:—One seat for sweepers on the Municipal Council, provision of quarters for sweepers, assurance that heavy fines would not be imposed on them and a demand that part time sweepers should not be engaged when wholtime sweepers are available, these were the demands by a deputation of the Multan sweepers on strike who waited on the Chief Executive officer of the Municipality on Dec. 15. The next day there was a clash between some persons newly engaged for cleaning the streets and the striking sweepers, but the police were soon on the spot and serious developments were averted. The total number of strikers is 500 and to-day is the second day of the strike. At a meeting the strikers decided not to resume work unless their demands were granted.

COLOUR LINE IN SOUTH AFRICA.

The Pretoria correspondent of the Hindu writes under date December 18:—

Strong criticism of the way in which S. Africa treated Indian visitors of culture and good standing as "inferiors and aliens" and a warning of inevitable repercussions on the attitude of India towards the Union were made by Mr. A. L. Qureshi to-day. He is a graduate of the University of London and has been awarded a special research scholarship by the University Bureau of the British Empire for rural credit and market organisation and has been furnished with letters of introduction by Lord Bledisloe, Governor-General of New Zealand, to Earl Clarendon and General Smuts.

Mr. Qureshi discovered on his arrival that he was not allowed to land in Durban till he had submitted to the restrictions imposed on coloured persons entering the Union. He was prohibited from journeying in the train save in the compartment specially reserved "for coloured persons." He was refused admission to cinemas, hotels and restaurants. He states that he was in all public conveyances and places of entertainment refused refreshment and carefully "segregated" from contact with Europeans.

Mr. Qureshi ended with a warning to S. Africa that coming political reforms will give a status to India almost equal to that of Dominions and the Indian Legislature would consider Empire unity not from the British but from the Indian viewpoint. The White population of S. Africa was only two millions and she would find it difficult to defend herself without the Army of the Empire. The largest army is in India. So in order to defend S. Africa against invasion they need the sympathy of India.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Terrorism a Hindu Movement:—The Government of India have no doubt that the Bengal Governor's estimate that the terrorist movement was "essentially a Hindu movement" is an accurate one, declared Mr. Hallet, Home Secretary in the Council of State while answering Mr. Jagdish Prasad. But he added that the phrase had been quoted from an isolated sentence of his Excellency's speech instead of giving the passage as a whole.

Prison Reform in Ceylon:—It is learnt that the appointment of a special committee to enquire into the questions connected with prison reform has been recommended by the Executive Committee for Home Affairs. The subjects for consideration of the Committee are fairly comprehensive, consisting inter alia of the treatment of youthful offenders, imprisonment in lieu of fine, system of release on parole of long-term prisoners, aid on discharge and training of prisoners in industry and agriculture.

Pandit Jawaharlal on Fascism:—Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru after thanking the press for giving publicity to his opinions states that he was shocked much to read a report of a so-called interview in Delhi to certain foreign visitors. He adds: "One thing I wish to clear up and that is on my attitude towards communism. The choice before the world to-day is one between some form of communism and some form of fascism and I am all for the former, that is, communism. I dislike Fascism intensely and indeed do not think it is anything more than a crude and brutal effort to preserve the capitalist order and preserve it at any cost. There is no middle road between fascism and communism. One has to choose between the two and I choose the communist ideal. In regard to the methods of approach of this ideal, I may not agree with everything that the orthodox communists have done. I think these methods will have to adapt themselves to the changing conditions and may vary in different countries. But I do think that the basic ideology of communism and its scientific interpretation of history is sound."

Indian Empire Exhibition.—His Excellency the Governor of the Punjab, Sir Herbert Emerson will open in Lahore on December 21 the Indian Empire Exhibition, which will continue for a month. Almost all the provincial Governments and some of the Indian states have taken stands in the exhibition and over 1,000 stands constructed for the exhibition have been occupied by leading firms from all provinces. The stalls are on the lines of the Wembley Exhibition. An art gallery, a hall of science and a central museum are among the main features of the exhibition.

Accident in Cumbam Valley.—A shocking incident unheard of in the history of the Cumbam Valley occurred on Saturday night when a herd of fourteen elephants was found dead scattered in a corn field, situated adjoining a mountain forest, in the vicinity of the Vannathirai Reserve in Lower Goodalore village limits, Periyakulam Taluk. The villagers observed the tragedy next morning and were horrified at the sight of huge tuskers lying prone in the sun-presuming them at first to be alive and sleeping, the villagers neared the animals with caution, fully armed. But they soon discovered that all the animals were dead. It is believed that the unfortunate animals descended to the plains getting scent of ripe corn in the field but as the corn, which is known as the Kirukkuvaragu variety, is subject to a peculiar and dangerous pest, in these parts; it is believed, the whole field must have been infested with this pest and caused the death of the beasts. The authorities rushed to the spot yesterday and are taking steps for the disposal of the remains including the ivory tusks of some of them.

Mr. K. M. Munshi on the Present Situation.—In a statement to the Press, Mr. K. M. Munshi says:—I find the country more weary than I thought it was. Evidently, insidious propaganda has been destroying our sense of solidarity; and defeatism, masquerading as difference of opinion, has eaten away our will to victory. I do not share the strange fascination which some of my valued friends and colleagues have for a formal meeting of the A. I. C. C. The forces which hold the fate of India in their grip at the present moment are so imponderable that formal votes are not likely to work miracles. Those of us—and I am one of them—who do not propose to offer Civil Disobedience for one reason or another, are, in my opinion, perfectly justified in devoting our energies to activities we consider proper. But, the authority and prestige of Mahatma Gandhi in the country alone stand between us and utter demoralisation and have to be maintained at all costs. I have no doubt that in the course of time Truth and Non-violence will adjust methods to new conditions.

Dr. Jivraj Mehta.—The Standing Committee of the Bombay Corporation decided by a large majority to reinstate Dr Jivraj N. Mehta in Municipal Service as Dean of the K. E. M. Hospital and G. S. Medical College. This item was treated as confidential and was not open to the press, but it is understood that there were three dissentients. The Commissioner placed before the meeting a letter received by him from Dr. Mehta giving an assurance of devoting his whole time and attention to his work. The following is the text of Dr. Mehta's letter to the Commissioner:—“With reference to my interview with you, I entirely accept your view that before considering the question of my continuance in Municipal service, the Standing Committee are entitled to demand an assurance that I shall devote the whole of my time and attention to service of the Corporation. I will not take part in outside activities which might interfere or lead to an interruption of those duties. I accordingly undertake to observe the orders underlying the Revenue and General Purposes Committee's resolution No. 36 dated July 8, 1929 and confirmed by the Corporation resolution No. 5693 dated September 26, 1929, and not to engage in activities forbidden by those orders. I request that this assurance on my part may be placed before the Standing Committee.” The Committee accepted the assurance and resolved to reinstate Dr. Mehta.

NOTES

The White Paper Scheme—Speaking at the Liberal Federation in Madras on Thursday, Mr. C. Y. Chintamani declared (according to the report in the Free Press Journal) that he would rather go on with the present constitution and carry on an agitation for a reformed and genuine self-government until a propitious day arrives, than put up with the mongrel constitution proposed under the White Paper scheme which, in Disraeli's words, is 'organised hypocrisy'. "I hold that we are nearer the day of swaraj if the White Paper scheme is dead." It may surprise the Secretary of State for India to know how many men there are in this country, of temperamentally moderate views, who share Mr. Chintamani's opinion. We ourselves have been astonished at almost identical words being used by some aggressively anti-Non-co-operation veterans. If the White Paper scheme is not wanted in British India, it is even less wanted by the people of Indian States as it completely ignores their existence. The Princes are not keen about it either, though they may not be able to keep out of it as matter of policy. A section of the Muslim intelligentsia, a growing one, has definitely pronounced against it. It is fairly safe to say that the proportions of friends of the White Paper in this country is less, both quantitatively and qualitatively, than that of people who will not have it in its present form. When this becomes clear to the British public, the opposition which is already strong may be able to defeat the Bill, should Government persist in going on with it. There is also the possibility that the National Government may cease to exist in the next two or three months as its record has been a very poor one. The chances of Mr. Chintamani's wish being realised is by no means negligible.

Business and Politics :—In an interview published in the Times of India on Thursday, Sir Pheroze Sethna who was a member of the Joint Parliamentary Committee on Indian Constitutional Reform observed with reference to the agreement between Bombay and Lancashire Textile interests recently concluded: "There was not the slightest doubt in the minds of the other delegates and myself that had it not been for the settlement arrived at in Bombay between the Lancashire Delegation and the Millowners' Association, Bombay, we would have met with very strong opposition from those witnesses who represented the Manchester Chamber of Commerce and other allied bodies when they appeared before the Joint Select Committee." This, of course, is not a defence of the Agreement on its merits. But it is valuable as an illustration of the falsity of the tag that business and politics are separate and should be kept apart. The Bombay Agreement was in effect a bargain between Lancashire and Bombay; Bombay agreeing to certain concessions and Lancashire in return mitigating its opposition to the White Paper Plan. This may or may not be good in itself but it was surely outside the scope of the Millowners' Association and it is pertinent to ask if they undertook this extraneous responsibility of their own free will. British Steel Makers are desirous of securing certain concessions in the Indian market. Other British manufacturers may come forward making similar claims. Their support or opposition may be quite as important as that of Lancashire. Would the Textile Agreement be taken as a precedent? Would it not be a more simple arrangement to undertake to pay a lump sum every year to Great Britain as suggested by Sir M. Visvesvaraya two years ago in lieu of numerous concessions the cumulative effect of which it is impossible to fathom now? These are questions pre-eminently for the politician, that is, a man trained to weigh questions not only with reference to their immediate effects on the 'bird-in-the-hand-is-worth-two-in-the-bush' principle but with reference to their bearing on surrounding circumstances and future possibilities. With Sir Pheroze Sethna we deprecate personal attacks on individuals, who happened to have a hand in the negotiations.

Ideals and Practice:—The following from Mr. Winston Churchill's "World Crisis" (volume one, page 11) furnishes the answer to our query in the leading article last week, "What did the Thugs do which the Christian nations did not do in the last war?" Recounting the measures adopted by both sides to secure victory, including efforts to starve whole nations without regard to age or sex, Mr. Churchill concludes: "When all was over, Torture and Cannibalism were the only two expedients that the civilized, scientific, Christian States had been able to deny themselves: and these were of doubtful utility." If Hinduism is to be depicted as a degraded faith because the Thugs worshipped Kali before undertaking their nefarious expeditions, Christianity cannot escape condemnation for blessing the banners of the armies in the war. You may compare the ideals of religions or their actual results on the people who profess them. In the former case, you will find that every religion emphasises one aspect of Truth and is supreme in so doing. Christianity stresses God's love, Islam, God's power, and Hinduism, His immanence. All together are needed to give a whole view of the Cosmic principle and purpose. It is therefore that a person who knows only his own religion is apt to be intolerant of others. If you insist on judging religion by its effect on those who profess them, you will find that every people fall far short of its ideals. It has necessarily to be so. "If a man's reach does not exceed his grasp what is Heaven for?"

The Revival of Indian Music:—One of the most marked features of the time is the vigorous movement for the revival of music in all parts of the country. The movement is particularly strong in South India which has a distinct system of its own. Sir C. V. Raman the eminent Indian physicist, presided at a Conference of musicians held in Madras and made an important speech. He contrasted the status of music in social life some years ago with what it has since come to be. For many years, he said, the art of music had to take a back seat in the social scale. The lover of music and musical artistes were classed along with domestic servants and even with a lower type of people. They receded further and further from society with the result that no respectable man or woman would think of devoting himself or herself to music. Things were a little better today, he acknowledged, but in tracing the causes for the improvement he overlooked the important movement against the nautch girl and devadasi customs carried on by social reformers for over forty years in the teeth, in the early years, of much contumely. The assimilation of the good points in Western music which Sir C. V. Raman recommended has been attempted with a measure of success, more in Bengal than in other parts of the country. In this and other ways, many good and some dangerous, Bengal has been the pioneer. Sir C. N. Raman said that there was some affinity between Science and Music. The scientist and the musician are both apt to forget themselves in their creative moods. There is also a difference. The musician, it has been said, makes out of three sounds not a fourth sound but a star. But the scientist is tied down to his medium. The moment he transcends it, he ceases to be a scientist.

The Social Conference:—We publish elsewhere extracts from the welcome address of Mr. Krishnaswami Aiyar, Chairman of the Reception Committee, to the delegates assembled at the Social Reform Conference at Madras. Mr. Krishnaswami Aiyar has taken a detached view of the many problems confronting reform workers and has pointed out what he considers to be the best method of carrying on the work. Throughout his address he lays particular stress on the importance of caution and moderation. He has in particular struck a warning note against the dangers of claiming special privileges for castes which have in the past suffered from disabilities. Mr. Krishnaswami points out that the political movement has indirectly advanced the cause of social reform. His appeal, however, for enlarging the concept of social reform is scarcely necessary for even a cursory study of the proceedings of earlier conferences will show that the term was used in its largest sense. Mr. Krishnaswami belongs to the right wing of social reformers and his views on the Sarda Act will meet with strong opposition from those who have all along demanded more drastic legislation. His faith in an ultimate compromise with "Sanatanists" is scarcely justified by recent events in connection with the anti-untouchability movement.

Russia and the Vatican:—Writing in its issue of December 9, the Commonweal, organ of the British Commonwealth Land Party, refers to recent reports that the Soviet Government are prepared to change their anti-religious policy "at the behest of the United States of America and the Vatican." If there have been such reports they have not appeared in the newspapers in India. One of the stock arguments against Communist theory has been that it aims at the abolition of religion and if Russia demonstrates that there is place both in the Communist State and in the Communist society for religion it would go far towards removing existing prejudices. Such a move would imply that the anti-religious aspect of the Bolshevik movement was merely a temporary phase in Russian politics strikingly similar to the Nazi's anti-Jewish policy in Germany.

BOMBAY, DECEMBER 30, 1933.

SELF GOVERNMENT AND SOCIAL REFORM.

Sir Hari Singh Gour made a very important speech at the Women's College, Nagpur, on the 22nd December. We are indebted to the Daily News of that city for a full summary of it. Sir Hari Singh is a scholar and an author of distinction. As a member of the Legislative Assembly he has striven hard to get laws passed to improve the position which women occupy in Indian society. His best known contribution so far is the amendment to the Special Marriage Act doing away with the obnoxious declaration requiring the repudiation of belief in any of the old religions as a condition precedent to the registration of a marriage under that Act. Sir Hari Singh intended his amendment to take the place of the Special Marriage Act. But, owing to the opposition of the other communities which feared that the amendment would be an infringement of their personal laws, Sir Hari Singh's amending Bill came to be limited to the Hindu community. Many Hindu marriages have taken place under its provisions which include all the incidents of a monogamous marriage. His attempt to make divorce an incident of a marriage contracted under the old Hindu law has failed. In his speech at Nagpur Sir Hari Singh confided to his audience that his public life has been devoted to the cause of women because he felt that the progress of India depended on their advancement and that without it, India would have no hopes for the future. Sir Hari Singh Gour has all along worked independently of political or party organisation and the position which he occupies in public life is entirely due to his ability and determination.

Sir Hari Singh Gour has served in the Round Table Conference at all its sessions. This is the first time that a member of that body has explained the necessity of political reform from the point of view of social reform. "When I went to England," he said, "I told the Britishers that the one great drawback of a foreign Government is that they cannot go ahead in social reform. Because the Government is merely a collector of taxes and disburser of the same. It is, therefore, utterly impossible to make any substantial headway in questions of social reform which may require money and would require in any case a greater organisation than the people of India are able to have at the present moment. It is for that reason that I am a staunch believer in the principle of responsible government in the country, and I hope that the men and women of India will demand this with one voice." Sir Hari Singh was emphatic that provincial autonomy will not help social reform. He wants social legislation to be made a Central subject and that the Central Legislature should have the right to initiate social legislation for the whole country. "If you leave it to Provincial Governments," he went on to say, "no advance would be made. As the local bodies are afraid of taxing the people for the purpose of introducing free and compulsory education among all classes, they will be equally afraid of introducing a large measure of social legislation which might better the condition of women in this country because they would also be afraid of the position of the sterner sex of the Province." The antagonism which Sir Hari Singh assumes between men and women in matters of social legislation does not exist, as women themselves, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi amongst them, have repeatedly stated in public in and outside India. Even if it did, surely it will make itself felt as much in the Central as in Provincial Legislatures. The real reason for according a concurrent power of social legislation to the Central is the imperative need to secure uniformity of social progress, which is the essential basis of nationhood, in all Provinces. Some Provinces and States are more advanced in social ideas than others and if the Central Government alone is to have the right of initiating social reform legislation, it may well be that the pace of progress would be retarded. The Provinces should be encouraged to take the lead and the concurrent power of the Centre is needed to co-ordinate their activities and achievements and to check retrograde tendencies on the part of any of them. Sir Hari Singh is right in holding that an adequate representation of women in the Central Legislature is essential to forward social legislation. Sir Hari Singh sees in the unanimous opposition of women to have the communal principle introduced in their representation, a great hope for Indian nationalism.

Sir Hari Singh recently visited Japan and he agrees with Sir Lalubhai Samaldas whose impressions of that country have been published in a book which we recently noticed, that the position of women in Japan is less favourable than that of Indian women. Except in respect of free and compulsory education which has made great strides among women as among men in Japan, Japanese women are at a disadvantage as compared with their Indian sisters. They have not the franchise and their property rights are even less than those of women in this country. But the right of voting means little where there is want of education and property rights concern only a small section of the people in all countries. Notwithstanding that Indian women enjoy the franchise on the same conditions as men, the prevailing illiteracy among them and the social customs of purdah and early marriage together constitute a grievous obstacle to their growth and development and consequently to their contribution to national progress. Sir Hari Singh Gour seem to be not without hope that the point of view which he and his friends placed before the Round Table Conference, may receive consideration in the final proposals during their passage through Parliament. Amidst the general pessimism about the outcome of the Conference, it is pleasant to have this ray of optimism.

THE INDIAN CHRISTIAN MARRIAGE ACT.

We are grateful to the Reverend H. A. Popley for his valuable contribution on this subject in the Reformer of 25th November last. It is an intercommunal and humanitarian problem that has been raised by the peculiar working of the penal Section 68 of Act XV of 1872 against Hindu priests and others of the Depressed class in the Madras Presidency. No Christian missionary is better fitted, if we may respectfully say so, than this much-esteemed friend of all classes in South India to help them to a clear understanding and fair adjustment of the conflicting factors involved in this problem. His participation in this question is therefore gladly welcome at this juncture although he does not, apparently, feel disposed to favour our earnest plea for the total abandonment of the prosecution policy of Christian Missions. Now that a month has elapsed without further comment by any one else, it may be safely assumed that his view of the matter represents accurately the considered view of all clergymen in responsible charge of Christian interests in this country.

Our good friend, the late lamented Dewan Bahadur Paul Appasami, M.A., LL.B., of happy memory, in preparing his valuable handbook on "The Law Applicable to Christians in India" for the National Christian Council, could only think of two grounds for his belief that the prosecution of Hindu and Moslem priests under Section 68 had been really contemplated by the framers of the Indian Christian Marriage Act. "This was intended," according to him, "to prevent a Christian wife from suffering by the Hindu or Mahomedan husband exercising his privilege of taking other wives superseding his Christian wife and depriving her and the children of their rights of inheritance under the Indian Succession Act (Page 72)." Two additional reasons are now suggested to give a moral basis to those prosecutions. They are necessary and indispensable, we are told, because the marriage of a Christian girl with Hindu ritual is null and void under the Christian Marriage Act and carries with it the disastrous consequences to her of an invalid marriage, and also because Christian girls are forced by their Christian parents often against their will into a Hindu marriage during their minority.

Now, if the Madras interpretation of the scope of Section 68 be correct, a Hindu priest would deserve punishment equally whether he administers the Hindu ritual to a Christian female or to a Christian male. The Coimbatore case in which he was convicted for the latter offence is an illustration in point. But neither the reasons given by Mr. Paul Appasami nor those now advanced explain what dire consequences to the Christian male were sought to be averted by the legislators by prosecution under Section 68. This serious gap in the explanation exposes the fallacy of the post-facto justification and discloses the real basis of the prosecutors' zeal as being a religious one. Leaving aside this aspect of the question, however, it will be found on examination that not a single one of the reasons given holds good even for the limited purpose for which they are put forth, namely the protection of the rights and freedom of Christian girls.

To understand the problem without bias, one must bear in mind that what the pro-prosecutionists object to is not the marriage of a Christian girl or woman with a Hindu as such, but her marriage with Hindu ritual. They have no objection if the same Hindu person is married to her by registration under the Christian Marriage Act though the ceremony does not convert him into a Christian and although the validity of such mixed marriage has been declared questionable even under the Act by no less a jurist than Sir V. Bhashyam Aiyangar. Fierce antagonism however is aroused in their breasts and becomes deadly if the selfsame couple marry with Hindu ritual! Why? It cannot be because the marriage is null and void under the Christian Act, which should not matter so long as it is valid under some other law of the land. It can only be accounted for by the fact that the ceremony usually adopted by Hindus is obnoxious to Christian religious sentiment, and, what is worse from the ministerial point of view, it has also the legal effect, among the Depressed classes of the South especially, of making the Christian bride a Hindu, even where the marriage was not preceded by a formal ceremony of conversion, as in Muthusami versus Masilamani (33 M. 342).

In none of the criminal cases launched under Section 68 was the validity of such marriage as a Hindu marriage impugned either by the prosecutors or the High Court. Mr. Paul Appasami, who was a learned lawyer and judge, nowhere went the length of saying that it was no marriage because it was performed in breach of the Christian Act. On the other hand he always took care to speak of the woman so married as a wife, even while he sought to justify the punishment of her Hindu priest. The question of validity of a marriage must be left to the Civil Courts to decide in any case of actual dispute, especially when it was contracted by the parties voluntarily and by a ritual of their own choice. Conscientious public workers, whether Christian or Hindu, would serve humanity better by refraining from cavil in such matters and by giving full credit for wisdom to the legal maxim semper præsuntur pro matrimonis, upon which Mr. Appasami himself had to fall back in the last resort in defence of the validity of mixed marriages solemnized by Christian Marriage Registrars contrary to the personal law of Hindus. We agree with him that "if two parties have been married according to the form which they regarded as applicable to themselves and have lived together as man and wife, the courts would hesitate a great deal before holding the marriage invalid." (Page 75). This applies with greater force to marriages performed with Hindu ritual, which has been held by the Madras High Court to unify the religion of both parties so as to bring their marriage under the general permissive rule of Hindu law. But supposing for argument that Hindu ritual would make it an invalid marriage, what right has any one to punish them by criminal action for choosing it, when they cannot be punished under the law even if they choose to live together without any ritual?

This brings us to the double plea of conserving monogamic rights for the wife, and securing favourable inheritance rights under the Indian Succession Act for the widow and her daughters. It was in hitting upon this secular ground for justifying their very natural Christian displeasure against the scapegoat Hindu priest that Mr. Paul Appasami and those who took the law from him fell unconsciously into a strange confusion of thought and did less than justice to themselves and to the intelligence of the public. They could very properly have said that a Christian woman would be wise to marry only a Christian man and have her marriage solemnized in accordance with the procedure prescribed by the Christian Marriage Act, because she would then be safe from the risk of bigamy by her husband (so long as he remained a Christian) and would enjoy as his widow along with her daughters the superior rights of inheritance given by the Indian Succession Act (if he remained a Christian till his death). But the argument which they found it necessary and plausible to urge against the Hindu priest was quite different.

It implied that it is the Hindu ritual that affected the rights of a Christian woman marrying a Hindu, and that, if only he married him by registration before a Christian Marriage Registrar, she would run no risk of being superseded subsequently by a co-wife and would also secure for herself and her female children the right of inheriting to him at his death according to the rules of the Indian Succession Act. We sincerely wish it were a true reading of the law. Part V of the Indian Christian Marriage Act would then have filled a large part of the gap that now yawns between the Special Marriage Act (III of 1872) even as at present amended and a general civil marriage law which is the desideratum of the new age in India. But such unhappily is not the case. The assumptions underlying the argument are absolutely unfounded in law. It is the personal law of the Hindu that dominates the situation not the ritual. There is nothing in the Indian Christian Marriage Act which takes away the polygamous "privilege" of a Hindu marrying under it or which abrogates the Hindu law rule of inheritance governing his property in favour of the Indian Succession Act (vide the Reformer of 22nd Dec. 1908, 13th June 1920, Page 655; 17th Nov. 1928, page 182; 27th April 1929, page 548; 11th Oct. 1930, page 88; 1st Nov. 1930, page 140; 22nd Nov. 1930, page 189; 21st Feb., 1931, page 398; 28th Feb. 1931, page 412; 16th May 1931, page 584.)

To insist on taking off the head, as it were, of the poor Hindu priest under the colour of such illusory grievances although he deceived none about his faith and offered his services to none but those who preferred and solicited his ritual with open eyes, and to use his supposed guilt under Section 68 as a lever for hauling up and hanging as his "abettors" the Christian offenders of the church and their Hindu relations for whose punishment through the criminal courts the Act itself has made no provision,—this might reasonably strike any mind, which is free from communal and credal pre-conceptions, as purposeless inhumanity and cruel disregard of individual freedom and unnatural twisting and misuse of the criminal law. But there is a further reason suggested to justify the prosecutions. It is that they are necessary for preventing Christian parents from forcing their minor daughters against their will into a Hindu marriage, that is, into a marriage with Hindu rites. We shall deal with it, if possible, in another issue.

HINDU LAW REFORM.

(By J. CHINNA DURAL.)

The principles of Hindu Law were enunciated more than three thousand years ago. It is indeed a matter of joy and pride to every Indian that Indian intellect and Indian talents had the vision and wisdom to produce a set of rules and laws for the proper conduct and guidance of Indian Society at a time when the other nations of the world were non-existent, or if they did exist, were barbarous or semi-barbarous and the notion of any law was remotest from their minds. But splendid as was the lead in law that India gave to the world thanks to the genius of Manu, the mightiest of law-givers that ever trod on ancient Indian soil, and his stalwart successors Gautama, Sankha and Parasara, to mention but a few names, and thanks also to the Vedas, Mantras and Sutras—the "uttered thoughts" of India's inspired seers, and the immemorial "usages" of the peoples of India,—it is greatly to be pitied that to-day judged by modern standards the laws of India are comparatively crude, out-of-date and primitive and are better fitted to be consigned to a first class museum as a glorious relic of India's antiquity than put into use to meet the needs and requirements of a race such as the Indian race which certainly is not the same to-day as it was in the days of Manu. It has progressed vigorously in every walk of life and thought during the past fifty years to a degree that makes Hindu Law nothing short of an anachronism simply allowed to be in force because there has not emerged yet a modern Manu who would have the courage to denounce it in the same way as Manu of old propounded it.

India to-day does not crawl on chariot wheels or double bullock carts but gallops on Fords and Rolls Royces. Indians do not shun the forbidden seas any more but cross them with an easy conscience by means of motor vessels, some of them even resorting to aeroplanes. The wireless Telegraph, Trans-Oceanic-Telephones, Talkies and Television have brought the world to India's very door. The annihilation of space and distance by means of express locomotives throughout the length and breadth of India has brought the divergent castes and communities of India incredibly closer. A keen sense of patriotism resulting in a national upheaval and a common aim and aspiration in regard to the political, social and economic welfare of India have made the disjointed warring India of old with millions of internal problems and disturbances, a solid united nation. Territorialism and Communalism are slowly disappearing and in all things that matter India's outlook on life and things to-day is a world outlook compared with her erstwhile narrow and provincial outlook. Indian schools and colleges modelled on Western lines and the tremendous influence of the West and particularly that of Great Britain are spurring India on towards ultra-modernism. India's superstitions and ignorance, her racial differences and communal animosities will all be soon things of the past and by quick degrees—whether she likes it or not—India will be 'modern' in every sense of the term like her sister nations of the world.

The question now arises—and it is a very important question—has Hindu Law kept abreast of the tremendous strides India has made towards advancement in recent times? Has the progress of Hindu Law been commensurate with the growth of modern India? Is not Hindu Law obsolete and must it not therefore be scrapped?

The answer to these questions must necessarily depend on what the Hindu law is to-day and what India is to-day. We have seen in the foregoing paragraph that India is tending to be modern, and is already quite modern in many respects. Can the same be said of Hindu Law? Emphatically 'No'. The origin of Hindu Law goes back to several centuries before Christ, to roughly about 1210 B. C. The Hindus claim that it is mainly divine in its origin, being the Revelation of inspired Seers and the institutes of revered Sages handed down by word of mouth from generation to generation. It is also human in this that at a later stage the approved and immemorial 'usages' of the people supplemented the Divine Law of India. It was on these lines that Manu and Yajnavalkya propounded Hindu Law nearly three thousand years ago. The principles underlying them are indeed sound and even remarkable when one considers that they were the results of human thought as early as 3000 years ago. In a law such as this there would be indeed no holes to pick if Indian society had remained stationary these 3000 years, but Time has

The principles of Hindu Law were enunciated more than three thousand years ago. It is indeed a matter of joy and pride to every Indian that Indian intellect and Indian talents had the vision and wisdom to produce a set of rules and laws for the proper conduct and guidance of Indian Society at a time when the other nations of the world were non-existent, or if they did exist, were barbarous or semi-barbarous and the notion of any law was remotest from their minds. But splendid as was the lead in law that India gave to the world thanks to the genius of Manu, the mightiest of law-givers that ever trod on ancient Indian soil, and his stalwart successors Gautama, Sankha and Parasara, to mention but a few names, and thanks also to the Vedas, Mantras and Sutras—the "uttered thoughts" of India's inspired seers, and the immemorial "usages" of the peoples of India,—it is greatly to be pitied that to-day judged by modern standards the laws of India are comparatively crude, out-of-date and primitive and are better fitted to be consigned to a first class museum as a glorious relic of India's antiquity than put into use to meet the needs and requirements of a race such as the Indian race which certainly is not the same to-day as it was in the days of Manu. It has progressed vigorously in every walk of life and thought during the past fifty years to a degree that makes Hindu Law nothing short of an anachronism simply allowed to be in force because there has not emerged yet a modern Manu who would have the courage to denounce it in the same way as Manu of old propounded it.

India to-day does not crawl on chariot wheels or double bullock carts but gallops on Fords and Rolls Royces. Indians do not shun the forbidden seas any more but cross them with an easy conscience by means of motor vessels, some of them even resorting to aeroplanes. The wireless Telegraph, Trans-Oceanic-Telephones, Talkies and Television have brought the world to India's very door. The annihilation of space and distance by means of express locomotives throughout the length and breadth of India has brought the divergent castes and communities of India incredibly closer. A keen sense of patriotism resulting in a national upheaval and a common aim and aspiration in regard to the political, social and economic welfare of India have made the disjointed warring India of old with millions of internal problems and disturbances, a solid united nation. Territorialism and Communalism are slowly disappearing and in all things that matter India's outlook on life and things to-day is a world outlook compared with her erstwhile narrow and provincial outlook. Indian schools and colleges modelled on Western lines and the tremendous influence of the West and particularly that of Great Britain are spurring India on towards ultra-modernism. India's superstitions and ignorance, her racial differences and communal animosities will all be soon things of the past and by quick degrees—whether she likes it or not—India will be 'modern' in every sense of the term like her sister nations of the world.

The question now arises—and it is a very important question—has Hindu Law kept abreast of the tremendous strides India has made towards advancement in recent times? Has the progress of Hindu Law been commensurate with the growth of modern India? Is not Hindu Law obsolete and must it not therefore be scrapped?

The answer to these questions must necessarily depend on what the Hindu law is to-day and what India is to-day. We have seen in the foregoing paragraph that India is tending to be modern, and is already quite modern in many respects. Can the same be said of Hindu Law? Emphatically 'No'. The origin of Hindu Law goes back to several centuries before Christ, to roughly about 1210 B. C. The Hindus claim that it is mainly divine in its origin, being the Revelation of inspired Seers and the institutes of revered Sages handed down by word of mouth from generation to generation. It is also human in this that at a later stage the approved and immemorial 'usages' of the people supplemented the Divine Law of India. It was on these lines that Manu and Yajnavalkya propounded Hindu Law nearly three thousand years ago. The principles underlying them are indeed sound and even remarkable when one considers that they were the results of human thought as early as 3000 years ago. In a law such as this there would be indeed no holes to pick if Indian society had remained stationary these 3000 years, but Time has considerably altered the whole fabric of Indian society and Indian thought and the application of Hindu Law to "New India" is like "putting new wine into old bottles" or hitching the 'Flying Scot' on to a goods wagon. If Manu were only to come back to life and see for himself aeroplanes and motorcars sweeping past him the extraordinary change in Indian manners and customs, the miraculous linking up of places and communities, the incredible merging of races and castes, and the astonishing tolerance and laxity in religion, he would surely offer profuse apologies for conspiring with the other law-givers of his time to bind hand and foot Hindu Society by a set of rules known as the Hindu Law which, while on the one hand it helped to solve legal problems at the time, has on the other tended to enslave Hindu Society for ever. The Hindu is a born Conservative and being a zealous stickler for religion he prizes the Hindu Law which is based on Hindu religion as a priceless gift from God, and would sooner die than in any way attempt by word or deed to belittle the Hindu Law. True he is himself modernised every day, but out of respect for his religion and a sneaking regard for all that is 'ancient' he would far rather let himself be judged by the antique law of India than submit himself even in the slightest degree to any departure from it. This is indeed the reason why all these 3000 years the Hindus have silently suffered themselves to be judged by a law which at its best is a 'curiosity' and at its worst a 'hindrance' to the progress of India. It is for the same reason to that no modern Manu in the shape of a law reformer has dared to come yet on the scene!

It may be asked in what respects the Hindu Law as administered to-day is defective and unsuited to modern thought and requirements? It is a question that by its nature necessarily involves a through discussion from line to line and page to page of all the standard treatises on Hindu Law, beginning with the sources right up to the recent 'decided cases' and the latest legislative enactments. In an article such as this it is not possible to delve deep into the subject and the only way it can be answered is by a sweeping generalisation of a few glaring defects which might afford sufficient thought for the budding jurists to ruminate upon and the powers-that-are to ponder over. The main purpose of this article is to set up a healthy controversy over the subject of Hindu law and create such an interest among the legislatures, judges, politicians and students of India that it might inevitably result in the ultimate well-being of India consequent on the administration of a more modern law than that which is at present in vogue.

THE PROBLEM OF GERMAN REFUGEES.

(By BERTRAM PICKARD)

It will be remembered that at the League of Nations Assembly in the Autumn the Dutch Foreign Minister proposed that the League should take up the problem of the refugees (Jews and others) that had fled from Germany on account of the Hitler regime. Eventually the League Council appointed a High Commissioner, and a Governing Body composed of the representatives of a certain number of specially interested States, it being understood that that body would be autonomous and that the High Commissioner would report to it, and not to the League Council itself.

Since his appointment as High Commissioner Mr. James MacDonald, formerly Director of the Foreign Policy Association of New York, has been busily at work studying the problem, and getting into touch with the chief governments and private organisations that are wrestling with the tragic difficulties of the refugees. And now the first meeting of his Governing Body has been held at Lausanne and the first formal steps taken in the organisation of the work.

In his speech to the Governing Body at its opening session on Tuesday, December 5th, Mr. MacDonald reviewed the situation in statesman-like terms, but with all the directness and common sense that is characteristic of American administrators.

From his report it appears there are at present some 60,000 German refugees, 51,000 of whom are Jewish. France alone has received 25,000 (22,000 of them being in Paris); some 5000-6000 each are in Palestine, Poland, Czechoslovakia and Holland; whilst from 2000-3000 are in England, Belgium and Switzerland.

These numbers are much smaller than the number of Russian refugees with which Nansen had to deal, but the economic crisis with widespread unemployment has increased the difficulties enormously, whilst the fact that 86% of the refugees are Jews introduces a special element into the problem. On the one hand the danger of rousing anti-Semitism feeling in the countries of settlement has to be guarded against; but on the other hand the characteristically loyal support of world Jewry afforded its unfortunate fellow Israelites has reduced the burden for the particular countries and towns where the refugees have found temporary asylum. Indeed, there is a real danger that for this very reason people in general, and especially professing Christians, will be tempted to evade or not to recognise their responsibility to help.

In this connection it is interesting to note that there will be in all probability an Advisory Committee set up to work in co-operation with the High Commissioner. On this Committee the chief agencies (Jewish, Christian and perhaps some others) will no doubt be represented. The work of the private agencies will be to raise funds and administer relief. The High Commissioner's work will consist in co-ordinating the work of the private agencies, in co-operating with them in the raising of funds; and negotiating with Governments about transit and settlement facilities.

THE INDIAN NATIONAL SOCIAL CONFERENCE 1933.

In welcoming the delegates to the Indian National Social Conference at Madras Mr. C. V. Krishnaswami Aiyar dealt with the difficulties which the conveners of the conference had to overcome before the present session could be held at Madras—on December 29th 1933—and replied to the contention of certain friends of social reform who had expressed the view that the necessity for such a conference no longer existed. Mr. Krishnaswami Aiyar referred to the work of early reformers, making particular mention of Raghunathrao, Ranade, Chandavarkar and Sadashiv Aiyar, and two others, Swami Vivekananda and Mrs Annie Besant, who had contributed indirectly to the social reform movement. Mr. Krishnaswami Aiyar said:—

We should all feel grateful for the measure of success which has attended the efforts of our predecessors in this field. To-day we are meeting under less difficult circumstances than what the great pioneers had to face when they began their work. Some of the problems set to them have lost some part of their difficulty. A further, and in my opinion a really important, change is the present attitude of some reformers themselves. Not long ago, many of those convinced of the benefits of the changes advocated on platforms such as this stopped short of actual practice. They gave them plenty of intellectual sympathy, but owing to inertia or the oppression of divided loyalties or some such other reason, they would not or could not act. Not that I undervalue even intellectual sympathy by itself; or that I am willing to cast a stone at their sincerity. Often times the paths of those placed in such circumstances that they were able to act, have been rendered very easy by such sympathisers. But the failure of large numbers of such reformers to act gave the opponents of reform a good occasion for gibes. Even that defect has considerably disappeared now. More men and women dare to act to-day and there is less difference between precept and practice.

All these hopeful features of the present social situation, we must thankfully acknowledge, are the result of the devoted labours of the fathers of our movement. It is not minimising the effect of their work if we realise also that their endeavours in this special field would not have prospered even to the extent to which they have prospered, but for two great movements outside it. Nothing has demonstrated the saying that life is a whole and one cannot make water-tight compartments of it better than the repercussion which the expansion of political activities in this country has had on the social difficulties of an earlier generation than ours. In those days there were eminent political workers who did not see that the very arguments they used in favour of greater political freedom would and could be used by the breakers of social shackles; and it was not uncommon to find one who was a "fire-brand", on the platform of the Congress, becoming suddenly moderate or even extremely conservative the next day when the Social Conference met and even actively throwing obstacles in its way. Bal Gangadhar Tilak, to whom the country owes a deep debt of gratitude for his activities in other directions was a conspicuous example of this class of public workers. Even he, in his later days, became conscious of the inconsistency of his position, and today there are few political leaders of his eminence or of any eminence who would act as he did in connection with the Poona Social Conference of 1895. They have all become social reformers now, though naturally, of varying degrees of fervour, and are willing to help in the devising of measures which will consolidate the nation, remove fissiparous tendencies and make for social justice. Some may taunt them by saying that their new enthusiasm has a vile political motive behind it; but it is more just to say that they have become convinced of the need for simultaneous progress in all directions. This is the general result of the political movement. A special result of very recent political activities—a result which must gladden the hearts of us all—is the sudden emergence of thousands and thousands of our dear sisters—aye, even of our mothers—from the ages-old seclusion in which their menfolk had placed them often at their own initiative. Whatever one's views may be as regards the direct results of the great movement of non-co-operation led by the most popular Indian of the twentieth century, this bye-product of it is one of supreme value. In the days of old, the usual defence of inaction of many men was that their womenfolk would not allow them to move. To-day it is very much the other way, and it would seem that instead of our sisters keeping us back it is the men that have occasionally to pull them up. I have heard that said by more than one enthusiastic friend of social reform in the recent controversies about divorce.

Of equal importance to the help rendered by the political workers—perhaps of more permanent value—is the assistance which our movement has derived from the new orientation which has taken place in the conception of Hinduism. The one stock objection to social changes is that the Hindu social policy is so intimately connected with Hinduism that any slightest change in the one will shatter the other; and as most of the problems of social reform concerned Hindus only—our Non-Hindu brethren who join us on this platform have fortunately fewer obstacles to surmount—this confusion of social policy and religion did great mischief. It had the disastrous effect of deceiving away many an ardent and sincere soul from what I think—if I may be permitted to voice my opinion—is the rock on which this social reform movement should be built, viz, a high spiritual outlook on life. Today, this confusion exists only in a very much attenuated form. For this change we are indebted to two great religious organisations which have done incalculable service to this country, though all may not see eye to eye with them as regards all their activities. I refer to the Theosophical Society and the Ramkrishna Mission. These two organisations are out and out supporters of social reconstruction and progress. No longer can it be said, as it used to be said of old, that social reformers were a set of irreligious persons out for the flesh-pots of Egypt. They have now the support of people whose services to Hinduism are beyond all reasonable cavil; and so long as we continue to have that support, our efforts are bound to succeed. The success of the Arya Samaj is proof, if proof was required, that people in this country would agree to the most radical changes even in social polity, if only they are attuned to what they consider is religious authority.

One may fancy that all that has been said by me till now makes these conferences less necessary than before. But he will take a different view if he has regard to two recent happenings. Like the Puranic churning of the milky ocean, the political upheaval that I referred to has thrown out things of divergent values. It has given us many a Lakshmi of surpassing usefulness, but it has also given us the fiery poison of communalism which has destroyed the social harmony that had resulted from decades of strenuous work by the progressivists. This is not the platform on which one should try to apportion the blame for this deplorable state of affairs. But it will be mere affectation to shut our eyes to the fact that there is great danger of its reintroducing caste in a more deleterious form than before. Some persons who objected to members of one caste being given special privileges merely on account of their birth in it, are now, paradoxically, claiming very exceptional rights for birth outside it and are further adopting a "nothing good can come from Nazareth" attitude towards them. Political safeguards are being sought, which will have the effect of permanently stressing caste differences. Further, our opponents of the conservative variety, are organising themselves to an extent unknown in the days of our elders. Sanatanists' conferences are now becoming common and their deputations are getting vocal to a degree. Their attempts to set the clock back have to be met. Only the other day our sisters at Bombay rightly thought it necessary to meet to object to the whittling down of the Sarda Act. We have therefore to be alive and active to prevent any recrudescence of reaction, if for nothing else. May I add here that, for one reason, I am glad that our conservative friends are active, for I see in it evidence of life. Ages of complacency had dulled their sense of social justice, and as in the saying that a thinking atheist is on the high road to theism, I believe that the active Sanatanist will very soon become a social reformer. It was not long ago that any advocacy of the subar.com caste inter-marriage would have attracted ridicule if not active opposition. Now Sanatanists find it necessary to sponsor it to prevent persons going for inter-caste marriage. To day, as I said, they would join that devoted band of men and women who work for the social and economic uplift of Harijans, if only they would not ask for temple entry, while not long ago they talked seriously that any attempt to alter the position of the Harijans would be interfering with the incidence of the divine law of "Karma". I am looking forward to the day in the near future when there will be a round-table conference of Sanatanists and reformers, wherein, by compromise, an agreed programme of social advance will be formulated. I am free to confess to a feeling that a grand opportunity of that sort was lost when the Sarda Act was fashioned, owing to the attitude of die-hards on both sides. If only "the 11 or 12 years" offer of Pandit Madan Mohan Malavayya, than whom there is no sincerer Sanatanist or progressivist in this country, had been accepted, and the measure had thus secured the support of his followers, the country would have been spared the sorry spectacle of thousands of young girls very much under 12 in age being married in haste to avoid the Act, and, what is worse, the contempt which is shown to established law by those who are allowed to disobey it without fear or anything more than the addition of a few hundred rupees to the debit side of the marriage budget. I venture to think that our cause has really been injured by the failure to seize that opportunity.

It may be that all our energies are not now required at the front at which the battle raged till recently. The concentration there may be unnecessary, and some part of the forces may be released for action elsewhere. The places of the old problems have been taken by new ones which are of equal importance and which are more urgent today. I have already referred to questions like temple-entry and divorce. Others like the expansion of women's right in property, the raising of their position in schemes of inheritance, and other similar alterations of personal laws, now claim our attention. Social purity and the suppression of immoral traffic and cognate problems of social and moral hygiene are becoming more urgent in view of what other countries with which we are coming in closer political contact, are doing.

Even our old friend "Temperance" has assumed a new importance. The reported failure of local-option in some parts of this presidency, and America going wet, have given a rude shock to those who thought that an effective method of combating the evil of drink had been found and have necessitated the devising of a new plan of campaign. Further, I think the time is come when the term "Social Reform" must receive a far more liberal and comprehensive interpretation than our fathers gave to it in the peculiar conditions in which they started their work. It must be equated now with everything that makes for the social well-being of every citizen, in the manner in which that term is understood in other countries. Not that it is, altogether, a new view; even our elders knew it, but their energies were needed nearer home. Now that a portion of it can be diverted, we may make it run along new channels with great benefit. In a sense, the poor have been, no doubt, always with us. But their cry is becoming more and more insistent, and is apt to go unheeded, at least as regards the caste portion of it, in the enthusiasm for the non-caste part. There are as many slums within the pale as outside it and work there is as urgent as among the untouchables. Better housing conditions and modern methods of helping the needy, such as poor homes and asylums for the aged and the infirm, will call for more and closer attention than they have received till now. Labour has no doubt become vocal, but it is not able to effectively assert itself yet. It must be helped to a proper share of the world's goods in an orderly manner, least, unguided and unhelpt, it may violently break its bonds. In a country where caste still determines one's profession to a large extent it is not altogether a question for the economist only, as it may appear at first sight. Problems of sanitation and hygiene—both personal and civic—will have to be faced and solved quickly if the new aggregation of humans in un-thought of forms are not to produce undesirable social wastage and loss of social efficiency. The greater political and personal freedom that all expect to come soon, and the loosening of ages-old shackles will produce repercussions which are not easy to predicate definitely, and those who desire progress to be orderly must be ever watchful and ready to help and guide. How much of this wider field we should cover immediately is a matter for you to decide. But whatever the extent may be, I am sure that any similar work will find as many active and sincere labourers as that for which the men and women of old toiled.

The Reception Committee has placed before you a varied bill of fare on the Agenda. It does not expect that every one will take the same view of all the resolutions. Some may object to the substance and some to the form of several of them. The omission of any one to divide the house on any resolution may not necessarily indicate that he votes for it. But I am sure that all of us are agreed on the principles this conference stands for. No one here, I believe, would object to social shackles which have outlived their usefulness being broken; to social injustice of any sort being remedied. And I trust that all are anxious that every member of our society should have the freest and fullest scope for self-expression.

In the work before us, I hope we shall be able to carry with us even those who are not now with us. It may be that in some spheres those who are not with us must be treated against one. I am unwilling to believe that it should be so in the service of justice and humanity which are what we aim at. Some of the new problems touch less those personal laws which can be easily mistaken for religion, and are, therefore, less likely to arouse passions. In any case, we should make a genuine effort to get the support of as many as we can reach, and our work will. I think succeed largely if we are careful not to take offence easily or to retaliate when it is not absolutely necessary. Sanatanists may be misguided, but we need not question their sincerity, even when some of them attribute base motives to us. Shastras may not cover the entire ground or be divine in origin, but they are not as unreasonable or obstructive as they are commonly supposed to be, and we can usefully make an effort, by careful shifting and proper understanding, to get their support as far as we can, and to conform to their spirit. Men and women are more unselfish and humane than we usually give them credit for, and above all, if I may venture a personal opinion, there is an Unseen Power which guides us all and which never allows injustice, inhumanity, and inequality to really prevail. If it were otherwise, mankind would have "fainted and fallen" in its onward march, long long ago. That it has not done so, but that in successive ages, in different climes, human endeavours to right such wrongs have proposed, in the main, is at once our motive power and substenance in our journey towards our goal.

ALL-INDIA SWADESHI SANGH.

We take the following from the Annual Report of the All India Swadeshi Sangh for 1932-33.

The All-India Swadeshi Sangh was started on the 12th of March 1932 in response to an appeal to the public issued by Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya to establish Swadeshi Associations all over the country to propagate the creed of Swadeshi and to carry on a vigorous campaign for the spread of Swadeshi. The main object for which the All-India Swadeshi Sangh itself was started was to stimulate the formation of Swadeshi Sanghas and Buy-Indian Leagues in all parts of the country, to affiliate to itself these local and provincial organizations and to guide and assist these organizations in their activities. During the year over a hundred and seventy Swadeshi associations and Buy-Indian Leagues were organised in different parts of the country. Provincial Swadeshi Sanghas were formed in Madras, Maharashtra, Bengal, Karnatak, Bombay, Sindh, Delhi, Marhatta C. P. and in the United Provinces. The movement also penetrated the Indian States. Madhya Bharat Swadeshi Sangh and Saurashtra Swadeshi Sangh carried on vigorous Swadeshi propaganda in Central India and Kathiawar respectively. In co-operation with the Buy-Indian League Madras, Swadeshi movement was also being carried on in States in South India, notably in Mysore.

The movement was carried on by means of securing Swadeshi pledges, house to house visits of individuals and groups of men and women, the publication and distribution of handbills, pamphlets, posters, directory and Swadeshi Bhajans, and the organization of public meetings, processions, exhibitions, museums, bazars and stores. A few periodicals on Swadeshi were also published.

In the history of the Swadeshi movement the year is likely to remain memorable for the number of Swadeshi Exhibitions held in various parts of the country. Twenty-five All-India Swadeshi Exhibitions and a large number of local Swadeshi Bazars and exhibitions were held. Moving exhibitions of Swadeshi goods were also organised along with processions. In spite of economic depression most of the exhibitions were great successes. In this connection we owe special thanks to our Vice-President, Sir P. C. Roy, who not only organised the provincial Swadeshi Sangh in Bengal, but also inspired and encouraged people throughout the country in the cause of Swadeshi by responding to requests to open Swadeshi exhibitions and to preside over other Swadeshi functions in many places.

In response to the appeal made by our President Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviyaji, the 29th May was specially observed as a Swadeshi Day throughout the country. On that day countless Swadeshi pledges were taken, handbills were distributed, meetings and processions were organised and in many places Swadeshi Exhibitions Bazars and Stores were opened. In response to the appeal of the All-India Swadeshi Sangh, more than sixty Municipal and District Boards communicated to us their resolutions to buy as far as possible Swadeshi goods for their requirements. Some of them were pursuing this policy for many years, but the majority of them passed the resolutions referred to above in response to the request of the Central office. A number of other public associations and conferences passed resolutions in favour of the Swadeshi movement. A number of Swadeshi Exhibitions were held by some of these associations. The All-India Seva Samiti Boys Scouts Associations Allahabad, issued detailed instructions to their Scout Masters to promote the cause of Swadeshi. Though there are nearly 200 local and provincial Sanghas and Leagues formed in different parts of the country, the number of these which sought affiliation to the Sangh during the year 1932-33 was 29. The subscriptions paid by these amounted to Rs. 145-0-0. Since the close of the year 9 new associations have sought affiliation and paid in their affiliation fees. It is to be hoped that bodies which joined last year but have not yet paid their fees for the current year will do so now without delay.

During the year under report, the Sangh interested itself in the preparation of slides dealing with Swadeshi propaganda and it is satisfactory to note that there was a good demand for this novel form of propaganda which may be expected to expand considerably in the future. Another matter to which the Sangh had its attention drawn was the unsatisfactory manner in which exhibitions were being arranged. There was during the year no meeting of the General Body, but there was one meeting of the Executive Committee.

During his last visit to Bombay in July Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, the President of the Sangh expressed a desire that the head-quarters of the Sangh should be shifted to Bombay. As an outcome of negotiations he issued orders under Rule 16 transferring the head-quarters of the Sangh to Bombay and appointing 6 local members to the Executive Committee (including two Secretaries and a Treasurer) to enable the work to be undertaken in Bombay.

The first activity after the transfer to Bombay has been the collection of funds, as a result of which Rs. 1500 have been received so far. The office has tried to establish touch with the various local and provincial organizations and issued to them circulars and letters. The Committee has decided that the Sangh should have a weekly journal of its own, and is developing arrangements in that connection. In the meantime, it has requisitioned the services of a well-known and experienced journalist to issue press-communicés and brochures, three of which have already been published. The Committee has issued a brief memorandum on the subject of the Mody-Lees Pact and the grant of protection to the iron and steel industry. It has secured information regarding the arrangement obtaining in various parts of the country in the matter of certifying goods as Swadeshi. Modest efforts are being made to build up an information bureau, with a library and a reading room attached to the office of the Sangh. There was a fair measure of response to our appeal for funds, on which the work is dependant.

The Swadeshi spirit and movement has saved Indian industries from ruin and promoted the industrial development of the country. It is important to note that during this period of economic depression, while the production of cloth in other countries considerably decreased, India produced a greater quantity of cloth than in previous years. A number of Swadeshi Stores were opened and many new industries were organised.

There is need for greater effort in the coming year. The new industries will need constant support and encouragement for a number of years. Our industrial development has not yet been sufficient even to meet our growing needs, not to speak of capturing the market already lost by us. The growth of imports of foreign manufactured goods has not yet been arrested. During the last year, while export of merchandise constantly decreased, our import of manufactured goods increased considerably. The import of piece-goods increased by nearly 50 per cent. The import of cloth increased by 4.14 crores from England and by 2.38 crores from Japan. The import of cotton yarn and twist also increased by over 90 lacs of rupees, more than 80 lacs of this increase was from Japan. The increased import of cotton cloth during this period of economic crisis has begun to be keenly felt by Indian industry.

It is hoped that all classes of the people, fully realising the benefits of and the need for Swadeshi will carry on this movement with redoubled movement. For the success of the movement it is necessary that a well co-ordinated network of Swadeshi Sanghas and Buy-Indian Leagues be formed throughout the country, including Indian States. Public spirited persons are therefore requested to organise Swadeshi Sanghas in places where one does not exist. Local and Provincial Swadeshi associations are also requested to get themselves affiliated soon with the Provincial and the All-India Swadeshi Sangh respectively.

THE ECONOMIC CONFERENCE AND NATIONAL ECONOMICS. *

(By MAXWELL S. STEWART).

After seven weeks of tempestuous existence, the World Monetary and Economic Conference adjourned sine die on July 27, 1933 without having accomplished any of its main objectives. As stated by its Preparatory Commission, the purpose of the conference was to resolve "the prevailing conflict of national economics" by drawing up a programme of "economic disarmament." To the commission, as well as to a majority of the delegates at the conference, this implied an attempt to restore the flexibility of the international economic mechanism in accordance with laissez-faire principles. On the assumption that a return to prosperity depended on the re-establishment of a world market unhampered by governmental restrictions, the Draft Annotated Agenda sketched a comprehensive plan for a simultaneous attack on both financial and economic problems. Emphasis was placed on the necessity for restoring the gold standard under conditions which would prevent a recurrence of the recent debacle. These included the reform of the present monetary system, the balancing of national budgets, and the "return to a reasonable degree of freedom" in the movement of goods, services and capital.

That the attempt should have ended in failure was scarcely surprising to close observers. Despite the successful conclusion on May 12 of a "tariff truce" between eight of the leading countries, the atmosphere in which the conference opened one month later was extremely unfavourable. Nationalism, although denounced at every opportunity, was never more conspicuous. In this direction the United States was probably no greater an offender than many others, but its wealth and position as chief creditor cast especial importance on the uncertainties and contradictions of its policies. Recent American monetary developments were a particular source of anxiety; President Roosevelt's somewhat unexpected failure to secure authority for adjustment of tariffs or negotiation of the war debts had given rise to the fear that the programme for national recovery, which had just received the sanction of Congress, would conflict directly with the administration's professed desire to lower tariffs and establish freer conditions of trade. Moreover, the collapse of the disarmament conference and disturbed political conditions in Europe resulting from the rise of Hitler in Germany had combined to intensify national distrust and animosities. Finally, the improvement that was already discernible in world economic conditions had led several of the more important countries, notably Great Britain and the United States, to show less interest in the outcome of the gathering than they had a few months previously.

Despite its failure to attain its professed objectives, the conference was not without achievements. The fact that agreements were secured at all, meagre though they were, is an indication that international co-operation is not beyond the realm of possibility. Many of the agreements possess a significance far greater than their immediate effect on the world economic situation would seem to indicate. Taken together with the failures, these agreements have value in charting the limits within which future discussions may profitably be carried on, a lesson which should save much time and expense should the conference be reconvened.

Although the question of inter-government obligations had been deliberately excluded from the agenda, the fact that no arrangements had been announced regarding the war debt payments due June 15 overshadowed all else at the outset of the conference. More than six months had elapsed since Great Britain, France and other debtors had despatched notes requesting a review of their obligations to the United States; yet no intimation had come from Washington regarding either the instalment immediately due or the time when negotiations would be commenced with a view to permanent settlement. This despite the fact that the close connection between the war debts and the other economic problems facing the world had been repeatedly recognized by all governments. A mild sensation was created at the opening session of the conference when Prime Minister MacDonald unexpectedly raised the debt issue in his introductory address. Speaking in his capacity as president, Mr. MacDonald declared that "the question of the war debts.....must be dealt with before every obstacle to general recovery has been removed, and.....must be taken up without delay by the nations concerned."

The debt problem was temporarily disposed two days later, however, when President Roosevelt agreed to accept "token" payments of less than 10 per cent of the amount due instead of the regular June 15 instalments. In acknowledging receipt of these payments, the United States in each case reiterated its willingness to review the entire debt question at Washington in the near future, but set no definite date for these negotiations. Not even the assurance of a review was given, moreover, to the seven countries which had defaulted entirely on their obligations.

While the speeches which consumed the first four days of the conference sessions were for the most part given over to generalities regarding the desperate state of world economic affairs, there were definite intimations of the clash of opinion that was to arise on each of the principle issues. Speaking for the French delegation, Prime Minister Daladier declared that "the first step was to put an end to the currency war and to restore to trade that essential guarantee of monetary security," which could only be accomplished by "the maintenance or restoration of the freedom of gold movements"; while "the second step was to organize controlled agreements between producers in order that their work might be closely adjusted to the real possibilities of consumption." It was significant that Mr. Daladier made no reference to tariffs or trade restrictions. Signor Jung of Italy gave his general support to this position, but in addition emphasized the necessity of obtaining an early settlement of the war debts, and opposed artificial expansion of credit for the purpose of raising prices.

Sharply contrasted with the French view was that of Secretary Hull, head of the American delegation, who particularly stressed the necessity of removing trade barriers on the ground that "international commerce was indispensable to national life." He also spoke of the need of stimulating national sources of employment, so as to build up consuming power which would lead to an inevitable rise in prices. The British position, as presented by Mr. Neville Chamberlain, was somewhat more practical. While advocating a reduction of tariffs and the ultimate restoration of the gold standard the Chancellor of the Exchequer pointed out that there were many factors in the situation which made immediate action in that direction difficult if not impossible. In common with the other speakers, Mr. Chamberlain emphasised the importance of raising prices, but in contrast to the Italian view, he declared that this might best be achieved by co-operation of the Central Banks in maintaining a policy of cheap money, aided where possible by government capital expenditures. Most concrete of all was Mr. Litvinov, Soviet Commissioner of Foreign Affairs, who, after expressing grave doubt concerning the adequacy of the policies suggested above, proposed that the conference "concentrate upon the potential absorption" of surplus stocks, and upon attempts to stimulate the increased utilization of capital goods. He asserted that under favourable conditions, such as lengthened credits and normal conditions for Soviet exports, the Soviet government might be willing to absorb a billion dollars worth of the surplus.

At the final session on July 27, no attempt was made by the majority of delegates to conceal their deep disappointment over the meagre results attained. While few were frank enough to admit utter failure, the most that could be claimed was that there had not been "that divergence of opinion on important subjects that might have been expected." Such achievements as could be listed were clearly not of the type envisioned by the Preparatory Commission, nor those which had been stressed by the delegates themselves six weeks previously in their opening addresses. The problems of exchange instability, tariffs and the other barriers to trade remained virtually untouched, and it was not even possible to claim with assurance that the discussion of these questions had led the nations closer to economic disarmament. On the contrary, some critics have declared that this gathering marks the end of all efforts to seek international co-operation through the conference method.

Explanations of the conference's failure to make progress in its appointed field are varied and frequently contradictory. Among those who deny that the conference method itself is at fault, it is most frequently asserted that the difficulty lay in the fact that preparation had been grossly inadequate. Other observers, however, deny the importance of this defect on the ground that even the most elaborate preparation for large international conferences is certain to be insufficient, and declare that what is needed is the time and will to consider problems at leisure without the constant threat of adjournment. Many others intimate that the unexpected abandonment of the gold standard by the United States made agreement on basic issues at least temporarily impossible, and that it was therefore a mistake to convene the conference at all under the circumstances.

A few writers, on the other hand, absolve the American Government completely, and cite the obstinacy of the "gold bloc" as the chief cause of the conference's breakdown.

More basic than any of these criticisms is the conviction on the part of some authorities that in seeking to restore world order based on laissez-faire principles, the World Economic Conference was attempting the impossible. To them, the sharply conflicting points of view at London were not so much the result of the complexity of the problems faced as the inherent difficulty of securing greater flexibility at a time when the whole trend of development seems to be moving toward greater rigidity and control. The NRA programme in the United States, the new forms of economic organisation in Germany, the rigid quotas set up in the recent British trade treaties and the legislation for regulating and controlling production and marketing are viewed as merely the latest phase of a tendency which has been developing since the war—the tendency of nations and economic groups to protect themselves against the rigours of free competition either by attempting to stabilize existing conditions or seeking governmental favours. As indicated by the Preparatory Commission, piecemeal measures would be of little avail toward reversing this trend. It would be necessary not only to restore monetary stability, provide for greater freedom in the movement of goods, services and capital, but also to adopt measures "for increasing flexibility within each of the separate national economies"—a task which few statesmen are prepared to undertake. Even conservative economists admit that the trend of events is towards a greater measure of economic control, although they maintain that this development is bound to intensify rather than remedy existing maladjustments.

To many observers, the only alternative to the policy of economic disarmament was the world-wide adoption of ideals of national self-sufficiency. While the collapse of the conference has not thus led to unbridled economic warfare, the danger of this development cannot be denied. For a time the tariff truce, to which some sixty nations had adhered by mid-July, acted as a restraining factor. Recently, however, the effect of the truce has been seriously undermined by the defection of Holland, Sweden and France and by Italy's action in raising tariffs on products from countries that have abandoned the gold standard. Moreover, the truce has not prevented France from further restricting imports by means of reduced quotas, while it is reported that the United States is preparing to protect its national recovery programme by levying fees in addition to import duties on certain classes of goods.

Yet side by side with increasing national rivalries may be found unmistakable signs of the development of a type of international co-operation which is markedly dissimilar from that contemplated in the early stages of the conference. This trend is perhaps best illustrated by the unanticipated success of the discussions in the sub-commission on the coordination of production and marketing, and the subsequent silver and wheat agreements. In the case of nearly a score of different commodities, producers have somewhat tardily realized that international agreement is essential for the elimination of cut-throat competition. Thus, paradoxically, the need for co-operation across national boundaries has been increased rather than diminished by the rise of economic nationalism.

Although schemes of the type projected are unlikely to be successful unless a groundwork of control has been built up within each nation, it has at least become apparent that adequate national planning necessitates a measure of regulation on an international scale. While there can be no certainty that the trend toward international regulation can overcome the divisive forces of nationalism or that the control will be exercised in the interest of the general welfare it is difficult to see how it can be reversed once producers have experienced the advantages of organization. Under such circumstances future international co-operation will probably not be concerned so much with the setting of rules of competition as in organizing economic activity so as to serve the interests of consumers and producers alike.

UNTOUCHABILITY IN SOUTH AFRICA.

"We Indians form one per cent of the total population of the Transvaal and you speak of us as a 'menace.' How can one person in a hundred be a menace? You say that the Indian is a trader. Of course he is. What else can he be? He cannot be an engine driver, or own land as he can in his own country. There is no country in the world—and I have travelled myself in over 30—where there are so many restrictions against Indians as this great country of yours," remarked Kunwar Sir Maharaj Singh, in the course of an address on "Untouchability," delivered to the Wesley Guild in the Wesleyan Church Hall, Boksburg, recently.

After explaining the untouchability question in India and the great strides made within the last few months in abolishing the evil by the great reform work done by Mahatma Gandhi, the Kunwar went on to say:

"We are doing something for our untouchables, and the work which is being done in India will never go back. The reforms being carried out can never be negated in the future. But what about untouchability in this country? In India, untouchability has a religious sanction, and you know how difficult it is to remove anything with religious sanction.

"But what have you done in your enlightened and progressive country, for it is truly progressive? I believe I have many sympathisers in this country, but they keep their sympathy hidden. I need open sympathisers. You are too timid, you have to take a little more action, a little more courage and you will find that what was bitter is sweet and what was sweet better.

"Teach your children not to despise people because they are five shades darker in colour. Everyone of the religious teachers of the world were men with dark skins, Moses, Jesus Christ—I have seen and known the classes from which they were born—Buddha, Confucius, who has many millions of followers in China. What was his colour and what the shape of his eyes? Mahomed and all the great religious teachers were Asiatics, and—forgive me if I say it—were born and lived among the dark-skinned nations, the Asiatics.

"How can you say that progress or culture depend on the colour of a man's hair or how his eyes slant? I do not know if there are any Municipal Councillors here to-night, but I would ask them to spend a few hundred pounds—no one gives more than a hundred pounds or so to the Asiatic—on the improvement of the Asiatic bazaars. We have some very decent fellows living in them. All Indians are not bad lots. And let us do something to help this untouchability in our midst."—Indian Opinion.

Heir to Japanese Throne:—A son and heir has been born to the Emperor of Japan. The boy will succeed his father as the hundred and twenty-fifth in the unbroken line of monarchs, reputed to date back to the seventh century before Christ. The Emperor has three daughters, a fourth having died in childhood.

NEWS OF THE WEEK

Tamil Book on Chemistry:—The Registrar of the Annamalai University announces a prize of Rs. 1,000 to be awarded to the author of a text-book in Tamil on Chemistry suitable for use in the Intermediate Classes. A manuscript or typewritten copy of the work should reach the Registrar on or before 1st July 1934. Further particulars of the prize can be had of the Registrar of the University.

No Buttermilk for Prisoners:—It is understood that the Government of Madras have after considering the pros and cons of the case come to the conclusion that prisoners are to go without Buttermilk as an article of diet. It is claimed that the Government will not find it possible to conveniently prepare and keep buttermilk every day in hygienic condition in all the prisons for C class prisoners numbering well over ten thousand on the aggregate.

Funeral Reform:—The Rajkot Social Service League has sent a draft resolution to the Secretary of the Indian National Social Conference to be held at Madras, for the consideration of the subjects committee, on reforming funeral ceremonies. The resolution reads: "To reduce the hardships felt by poor families in the land and the community at the time of funerals; and to further the cause of social reform in the country, the conference advise each and every community to reform the method of conducting funeral parties by substituting public hearse and the method of open pyre cremation by modern public crematoria in big towns."

Separate University for Sind:—Under the auspices of the Karachi Teachers' Association, Acharya Gidwani, Administrative Officer, made a strong plea for the immediate creation of a separate unitary University for Sind, making Karachi its head-quarters with three colleges for Arts, Engineering and Law. He suggested the Hyderabad Degree College to be reduced to the intermediate stage on the level of Shikarpur College. He estimated Rs. 50,000 would be more than sufficient to make a start. He cited the example of the Delhi University which started with three colleges.

Sir C. V. Raman on Music:—The Seventh Annual Music Conference, conducted under the auspices of the Madras Music Academy, was opened on the 2nd by Sir C. V. Raman in the presence of a distinguished gathering. The Conference will continue for several days, forenoons being devoted to the reading of papers and questions on music and afternoons to illustrative musical performances. "Unless we solved the mystery of genius we will not be able to solve the mystery of music, for, one is the creation of the other," said Sir C. V. Raman in opening the seventh Music Conference organised by the Music Academy of Madras. The Academy presented him with a welcome address enclosed in a silver casket.

Health of Political Prisoners.—When the Legislative Assembly met on the 28th the Home Member replying to Mr. S. C. Mitra's question regarding the health of the State prisoners in Mainwall, denied the allegations and as there was some laughter on the Government side Mr. S. C. Mitra protested this was not a matter for laughter. When the censor erased portions from a letter relating to the health of detenus the members sought information. The Home Member replied if the Member was merely anxious to obtain information he could write to him (Home Member) and get the information. Sir Harry Haig added that it was unfortunate that such a great number of questions should be asked in the House regarding the details of the health of detenus and asked the member to reflect that the continual publication of these allegations conveyed mischievous effects in Bengal as it served to keep alive the sympathy with terrorists as individuals and in that way stimulated some sympathy with the movement with which they were identified. Mr. S. C. Mitra remarked that it was misleading to say that the question showed sympathy with the detenus.

Asiatic Students' Conference:—In the course of his opening speech to the Congress of Asiatic students, Signor Mussolini referred to the civilisation uniting the East and the West that was created by ancient Rome. But he added that after the new currents of commerce came, the relations between the Occident and the Orient became exclusively bonds of subjection and were limited purely to material considerations. For this reason, all nations were interested in the reaction against degenerate capitalism and liberalism. And this reaction was best represented by Italy's Fascist revolution. "To-day, Rome with the renaissance brought about by Fascism is preparing to resume its unifying function between the East and the West. And for this purpose new Italy calls you together."

Mr. G. K. Devadhar's Mission to Cochin:—The Cochin Government have requisitioned the services of Mr. G. K. Devadhar, President of the Servants of India Society, to visit some of the representative societies in the State and advise the Government on the lines in which the movement could be improved. The enquiry has been ordered, writes the West Coast Reformer, in pursuance of a resolution passed by the Cochin Legislative Council and Mr. Devadhar who is to be here shortly to preside over the State Co-operative Conference will be treated as a State guest during his stay in the State. The purpose of the enquiry is to ascertain the present condition of the co-operative movement by visiting about a dozen typical societies and to lay out the lines of future progress, the improvements necessary in the financial system of the movement, improvements in regard to propaganda, supervision and control of societies and finance and improvements and facilities necessary for development of non-credit activities.

English Poetry:—His Majesty the King-Emperor is offering each year a gold and silver medal for poetry in the English language published in volume form within the Empire by British citizens. The following committee has been appointed by the King to act as judges:—Mr. John Masefield (Poet Laureate,) chairman, Mr. Laurence Binyon, Mr. Walter De La Mare, Professor Gilbert Murray and Mr. I. A. Richards. A small sub-committee will be appointed abroad to recommend books from India, the Dominions, and Colonies. The medals will be awarded towards the end of each year for works published during the preceding year. The first awards will be made in December, 1934, for works published during 1933. The medals will be given either for a poet's first or second volume of verse or to a poet still under 35 years of age. The Committee is empowered to withhold any recommendation for the medals in any year in which they consider the work submitted is not of a sufficiently high standard. Only works that have been published in volume form will be considered, and all communications relating to these medals should be addressed to the Poet Laureate.

Child Marriage:—In the house of Commons replying to Miss Rathbone, inquiring about the steps taken to educate public opinion in India with regard to evils of child marriage in view of the disregard of the Sarda Act as revealed in the 1931 census report, Sir Samuel Hoare said that he had received the Government of India reports showing that the Government of India and the local Governments had very carefully considered the recommendations of the Age of Consent Committee and there was a consensus of opinion regarding the desirability of an educative propaganda concerning the evils of child marriage, but it was generally agreed that it was best to leave the matter to non-official agencies. With regard to other administrative measures recommended by the committee the local Governments fully sympathized with the need for reform and would take action which appeared feasible but most of the specific proposals were at present impracticable for various reasons. Sir Samuel Hoare undertook to convey to the Government of India Miss Rathbone's suggestion for the appointment of a commission to inquire into maternal mortality.

NOTES

Ram Mohan Roy and Ranade:—It is well to praise the fathers that begat us; though we sometimes feel that the tendency nowadays to confer this distinction on all and sundry threatens to make life a long series of jayantis and anniversaries. This can not be said of the celebrations in commemoration of the centenary of Raja Ram Mohan Roy and of the unveiling of the portrait of Mahadev Govind Ranade in Madras by Mr. C. Y. Chintamani who made a felicitous speech on the occasion. Ram Mohan Roy and Ranade are the two greatest figures which contact between India and Britain has produced. If Ram Mohan traced out in broad outlines the ground-plan of Indian nationalism, Ranade showed us how to build on it and what materials were to be used in it. Both the Raja and Ranade were deeply religious men who saw the finger of God in history. Both held that British rule in India was divinely designed for the regeneration of their country. Both were critical of the measures of British rule but always with the object of keeping it to the main purpose of its existence here, as they conceived it. Both were inspired by the same principle of reconciliation of the present with the past and of the past with the present as the true function of the reformer. Both viewed Indian history as a mighty stream coming down from Himalayan heights to fertilise the plains. The two men stand high above every other whom modern India has produced and their example and teachings are a perennial source to which Indian leaders will turn for guidance and inspiration. In one respect Ranade, perhaps, surpassed Ram Mohan Roy. The latter was educated and brought up in the early impressionable years of his life in the social and cultural environment of Islam and Hindu Muslim synthesis, therefore, came naturally to him. Ranade, on the contrary, inherited the instincts implanted by Maratha history in his class; and it was by study and reflection that he overcame them sufficiently to lay the foundation of a synthetic history as the background of Indian nationalism.

The Hindu Mahasabha and the League of Nations:—The League Secretariat has replied to the representation of the Hindu Mahasabha to the effect that the constitution of the League of Nations does not permit it to take up questions which are not officially brought before it by the Governments of the member States. It could not take up the Jewish question in Germany for this reason. The Dutch representative indirectly raised a discussion on it by moving the League to adopt measures for the relief of the refugees from Germany. If the Mahasabha can persuade Mr. De Valera that the Communal Award impinges on the rights of the Irish Free State, there would be a chance of its being debated in the League Assembly. But the Mahasabha need not be sorry. Though the League under its constitution can not deal with the question at its formal sessions, the members unofficially have been made aware of its views. Some one asked the late Mr. Ranade, whom Mr. Chintamani rightly praised as the brain behind the National Congress in its early days, why he took so much pains over representations and memorials knowing full well that none of them will have any effect on the powers that be, Ranade replied that he had no illusions in the matter but that his object in drafting these model documents was to educate his countrymen and to train the public to deal with administrative questions. The Hindu Mahasabha has cast its bread on the waters and may console itself with the hope that it will find it after many days.

Untouchables and Temple Entry:—In his presidential address to the National Social Conference Mr. G. K. Devadhar described the public attitude to the admission of untouchables into Hindu temples. He said: "Temple entry and legislation thereabout are bones of contention; more so, because, the depressed classes have not shown much active enthusiasm for temple entry for the satisfaction of their truly religious cravings; while others who advocate it, in spite of this indifference of the community, do so because in this sphere of social reform they do not like to be accused of allowing a weak point in the Hindu social polity to remain an infe-priority complex." Coming as it does from the President of the Maharashtra branch of the Harijan Seva Sangh, this statement may be taken to foreshadow a relaxation of the efforts of that body to get temples opened to untouchables. The orthodox opposition, too, may ask, if temples are not considered essential to worship by the depressed classes, of what other conceivable use it can be to them. The reform of worship in temples so as to make it spiritually elevating, has been long overdue.

The Viceroy and Gandhiji in Southern India:—The reception of Lord Willingdon during his last winter tour in Southern India was everywhere, in the States as well as in Madras City, marked by great cordiality. One or two days after His Excellency's departure, the Southern Presidency and the States made ready to accord Gandhiji welcome with equal cordiality. In both cases the personal factor counted for much but it is not all. The extravagant programmes of some political leaders have operated in favour of the existing system in many minds on the principle that it is better to bear the ills we have than fly to others that we know nought of. The idea of legislation to remove untouchability is repugnant to many who are convinced of the absurdity of the custom and are working in other ways to bring about its disappearance. The public feeling in South India, while it appreciates Gandhiji and approves of his aims, disfavours non-co-operation with Government. It would welcome a speedy understanding between Lord Willingdon and Gandhiji as a preliminary step for clearing the ground towards reconciliation of British with Indian national interests.

The Seva Samiti and the Scout Movement:—Pandit Hridayanath Kunzru gave an interesting account of the origin and progress of the Seva Samiti movement at a public meeting in Madras last week. It is reproduced elsewhere. The Seva Samiti was founded when Asiatics were not admitted to the Baden Powell organisation. Since then, the ban has been removed and in several places the Samiti and the Scouts exist as parallel bodies. The Pandit explained why the two could not be amalgamated at present. Mr. Venkatrama Sastry who presided, however, expressed the opinion that the reasons given were not applicable to Southern India. In the Madras Scouts Association, he said, there were Indian members of eminence who would not have taken part in it unless they were assured that it was capable of full national service. He added: "That and the fact that the Samiti Scout movement had not made any headway in Madras, seemed to indicate that the public had confidence in the Baden Powell Association." This points to a difference of outlook between Northern and South Indian nationalism, due to historical reasons.

A French view of Indian Life:—Madame Morin who is visiting India for the first time, told the representative of the Hindu that perhaps the only Indian custom which had appeared unfamiliar and unsympathetic to her, was the custom of purdah. This may surprise those who have been taught to regard the British social system as typical of the European. This is far from being the case. Writing of the French family, Cohen-Portheim observes in his brilliant book, "The Spirit of France": "The family is the kernel of the whole body politic. The Latin Frenchman lives primarily in and for his family. This last does not consist merely of his wife and children; it is the regular thing in the provinces, and very common even in Paris, for grandparents, parents and children all to live together, forming a whole tribe, which is generally ruled over by the senior grandfather. Consequently marriage, for a Frenchman, is not primarily a matter of love, but rather the foundation of a new family, in which reason and economic considerations count for most." The Frenchman would probably agree with Disraeli's view of love marriages. "As for love," he wrote to his sister, "all my friends who have married for love or beauty, either beat their wives or live apart from them. This is literally the case. I may commit many follies in life, but I never intend to marry for 'love', which I am sure is a guarantee of infelicity." And he did not.

Birth Control:—The National Social Conference held at Madras has been rather precipitate in committing itself to the support of an aggressive propaganda under official auspices in favour of birth control. The question was raised a few months ago on an imperfect understanding of some casual observations in the Report of the Census Commissioner for India. It has been debated in the Press and at public meetings and weighty arguments have been adduced against its being made a subject of official propagandism. It has been rejected by several women's conferences. Control by artificial means is a mechanical solution for a moral problem.

Asia and Europe:—The idea of holding a Conference of Asiatic students in Europe is a happy inspiration. The speech with which Signor Mussolini opened the first Conference in Rome, will strike a responsive chord throughout Asia. The summary of it supplied by the Italian Consul-General to the Press is printed in our news columns. In a few terse sentences, Signor Mussolini summed up the history of the relations between Europe and Asia during twelve centuries. The ancient understanding between the two continents has been replaced by European exploitation which has broken all spiritual links between East and West. Italy where the East meets West now resumes her unifying function between Europe and Asia. A permanent centre is to be established in Rome for the promotion of this high object. Mr. Subhas Bose who, like Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, is in the direct line of succession to Congress leadership, recommends the study of Fascist methods by Indian reformers.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, JANUARY 4, 1934.

THE DECEMBER CONFERENCES.

The criticism that Indians devote a disproportionately large amount of attention to politics, is no longer true. For proof of this, one has only to refer to the conferences held last month. We note below only the more important All-India Conferences. The Lucknow Muslim Conference aimed at bringing about unity among Muslims which for some unaccountable reason seems to have been impaired recently. The National Liberal Federation which met in Madras is a political body voicing the opinion of Indian constitutional reformers. The Indian National Social Conference which, after some years, also met in Madras, as its name implies, deals with questions of social reform. There were two All-India Labour Conferences, one in Bombay and the other at Cawnpore. The difference between the two is, we understand, one of degree rather than of principle. The All-India Women's Conference held at Calcutta represents several Provincial Women's Associations and is at the present time the best organised movement in the country. The All-India Medical Licentiates' Conference, both held in Bombay, dealt in a comprehensive spirit with the problems of public health and sanitation. Along with these may be mentioned the Conference held in Madras of practitioners of the indigenous system of Medicine known as Siddha. The Indian Science Congress began its sittings in Bombay on Tuesday. The All-India Economic Conference met at Chidambaram about the same time under the auspices of the Annamalai University. The All-India Swadeshi Workers Conference held in Bombay passed important resolutions regarding the measures needed to foster home industries. The All-India Educational Conference which met at Karachi was attended by prominent educationists in the country. The Oriental Conference held in Baroda was representative of Indian scholarship in the region of antiquities and historical research. An All-India Catholic Conference met in Madras during the closing days of last year. There was an All-India Kayastha Conference in Allahabad and an All-India Vysya Conference. The Tamil Lovers' Conference which held its first session in Madras represents an awakening in South India to the importance of promoting the growth of a modern Tamil literature. The South India Music Conference held its sitting for several days and passed resolutions, some of which are of a highly technical character. There were several caste conferences, such as the Andhra Agnikula Kshatriya Conference. The Varnashrama Swaraj Conference professes to advocate a scheme of self-government in conformity with Hindu social ideas. The All-India Baloochi Conference held its sittings this year in Hyderabad, Sind. The people of the Indian States held their All-India Conference as usual. Of these Conferences not more than three, or at most four, dealt with politics directly. Most of the others dealt solely with non-political subjects. A few, such as the Industrial and Educational Conferences, made only incidental reference to the administrative and political aspect of the issues raised in their discussions.

Some important inferences emerge from this season of Conferences. The holding of a Social Conference with the Liberal Federation for the first time is an event of great significance. The Indian Liberals had concentrated too much on constitutional reforms to the neglect of social questions, and it is due to this that even now very few women figure in the proceedings of the Liberal Federation. The dry bones of the valley are becoming instinct with life. The Indian people are realising that political institutions derive their significance and efficacy from the social, educational and economic factors of a nation's life. They also realise that the method of conference and public discussion of questions is the most efficacious way of creating and moulding opinion and that the time and money spent on them are not wasted. A third inference of great significance is the tendency to give an All-India character even to bodies which relate to interests and topics of a predominantly local and sectional character. This, seemingly, is in striking contrast to the insistence on provincial autonomy in provincial and municipal administration. Indian nationalism, however, is striking root in the layers of life deeper than the political system which floats like oil on water on Indian social life. A fourth deduction from these conferences is that several of them aim at improving castes and communities not as an end in itself but as a means of making their maximum contribution to national progress. Communal and sectional movements cease to be harmful when they are conducted with constant reference to the interests of the whole country. From this standpoint, the purely political Conferences suffer in comparison with the non-political ones. The system of self-government foreshadowed in the White Paper, has no relevancy to the aspirations of the people to reconstruct Indian society on lines congenial to their ancient genius and compatible with the insistent demands of the spirit of the times. Several of the activities represented by these Conferences are in other countries directly undertaken or indirectly fostered by the state as the supreme organ of society. The sure test of the new constitution is whether it can attract to itself the support of all these varied elements of life in the country. If it does not, it will become a deadweight on national life, the removal of which would become the necessary condition of national growth. The consideration has been almost totally absent from the minds of the British and Indian Governments, and it does not seem likely that it will get recognition at this stage of the reform proposals.

RECENT SOCIAL LEGISLATION IN BARODA. (By V. K. DURANDHAR.)

As is well known there are two principal schools of Hindu Law in India—the Mitakshara School prevailing in the whole of India except Bengal and the Dayabhag school prevailing in Bengal. The Mitakshara is a running commentary on the Yajnyavalkya Smṛiti. The Mitakshara school is sub-divided into four minor schools; all these sub-schools acknowledge the supreme authority of the Mitakshara; but they give preference to certain treatises and commentaries; for instance, the Bombay School gives preference to Vyavahar Mayukha (a commentary written by Nīlkantha Bhatta) over Mitakshara where there is a conflict between the two; the Madras School, prefers Virmitrodaya which is also a commentary.

In Baroda Hindu law is codified; there are different Acts dealing with different aspects of Hindu Law, viz., Joint Family, Inheritance, Disposition of property, Adoption, Parents and children, Marriage, Divorce, etc. These Acts were based on the Mitakshara law supplemented by Vyavahar Mayukha which prevails in Gujarat including Bombay.

There was therefore upto now no material difference between the law applicable to Hindus in Baroda State and the law applicable to Hindus in British Gujarat.

In all the above-mentioned Schools women are under certain disabilities in respect of holding and disposing of property—disabilities which are generally well known to the public.

First we shall take up the question of the position of a widow in a joint Hindu family. A joint family, as is well known, consisted in Baroda, as it does even now in British India and elsewhere, only of male members of the family. A widowed mother or a widow of a deceased son or a deceased brother was not a coparcener—i. e., she was not a member, technically speaking, of a joint Hindu family. She was only a dependant. She had no rights of ownership over the family property. She had only a right to maintenance. Under the law now amended, the widow of a deceased coparcener shall be a coparcener herself. She has now all the rights which were formerly enjoyed by male members of a Hindu joint family—that is, she now becomes an owner of family property jointly with other members of the family. One of the important rights of a coparcener is the right to ask for a partition of the joint family property. A son or a brother could ask for a partition, get his own share determined and separated and become the full owner of that share, whereas formerly the widow had no such rights. She could have a share if a partition of the family property took place among her sons but she herself could not ask for a partition. She had therefore to remain content with what she got by way of maintenance. Now under the amended law she becomes a coparcener and as such will have as much right to ask for partition and get her own share in the family property determined and separated as any male member of the family and when she exercises that right she will get a share equal to that of a son if she has one; in the absence of a son she will get what her husband would have got had he been alive at the time of partition.

We shall now see what the position of the widow was in respect of the separate or self-acquired property of her husband and what it has now become according to the amended law. When a man having self-acquired property died, the property according to the old law descended to his sons, grandsons and great-grandsons; the widow of the deceased person did not inherit the property of her husband. She inherited only when there was no son, grandson or great-grandson. By the amended law, a widow will inherit her husband's property along with the son, grandson and great-grandson, and she will be entitled to a share equal to that of a son.

The position of a widowed daughter-in-law is also improved in as much as she now ranks next after the mother in the order of succession. Formerly, she had no place in the enumerated heirs who inherited the property of a deceased person in the prescribed order.

Next we come to the position and rights of a daughter. A daughter inherited to her father only in the absence of a son, grandson, great-grandson, and the widow of the deceased. If any one of these was living a daughter took nothing by way of inheritance. No change is made in this position but now a daughter is given more rights in her father's family than she had before. Formerly a married daughter had no rights in her father's family. Even if she was a widow and had no means of maintenance in her father-in-law's family, she could not claim maintenance from her father's family. According to the law now amended a widowed daughter is given a right to maintenance in her father's family, provided she is living with her father from the time of her husband's death and there are no means of maintenance in her father-in-law's family and her father can afford to maintain her. Now we shall consider the position of an unmarried daughter. She was only a dependant in her father's family, had only a right to maintenance and marriage expenses and when partition took place, she was entitled to get $\frac{1}{2}$ of what her brother got, in lieu of maintenance and marriage expenses; but she could not force a partition and have her share separated. She is now given a right to ask for the separation for her share (equal to $\frac{1}{2}$ of her brother's share) in lieu of maintenance and marriage expenses, even if no partition takes place in the family.

In certain cases the law of succession was complicated. For instance, when daughters inherited, an unmarried daughter was preferred to a married daughter and among married daughters a poor daughter was preferred to a rich one. All these distinctions are now removed and all daughters whether married or unmarried, rich or poor will take equally. Similarly the law of Succession to Stridhan is very much simplified. Under the Mayukha Law which prevails in Gujarat and also in the State the three kinds of Stridhan, viz. Yautak, Ayautak and Shulka descended to heirs each in a different order. Now one uniform order is prescribed for succession to all Stridhan.

Formerly a woman had absolute interest in her Stridhan only but a limited interest in all other property. She could do what she liked with her stridhan but as regards all other property which she held as an heir or which came to her share at the time of partition, she had only a limited interest, that is to say she could only enjoy the property but could not dispose of it; she could not alienate it except for certain purposes recognised by law; such property descended on her death not to her heirs but to heirs of the last male owner. A woman will now have absolute interest in property which she acquires either by partition or as an heir, provided that value of the property does not exceed Rs. 12,000. If the property is worth more she will have an absolute interest in the property to the extent of Rs. 12,000 and only a limited interest in the rest of the property. She has now as much right of alienating the property which she holds absolutely, as a male owner. These changes in the Hindu law will have a very far-reaching effect taken with the right of asking for a divorce conferred by the Hindu Divorce Act which has been in force from 1981.

DIVORCE AND SOCIAL RECONSTRUCTION.

(BY WALTER BROOKS FOLEY.)

The equilibrium of social life the world over has been thoroughly disturbed. This fact is overlooked in the midst of economic and political disturbance. Yet it will probably exercise a more profound effect upon the human race than either of the other factors that are now attracting so much attention. There is a kind of disintegration proceeding that is having its repercussions in a variety of ways. One clear-cut evidence of the break-down of old social customs and legal traditions is in the field of marriage,—or as it is thought of most commonly, in the difficulties surrounding the increase of divorce.

Men and women seem to find it increasingly difficult to adjust themselves to a fixed married state on the old bases. It may be that men and women are not willing longer to make sacrifices they felt in duty bound to make only a few years ago in order that homes and family life might be maintained. It would seem that when it was advocated in the U. S. S. R. a few years ago that children might be taken from their parents and brought up in special Children's Homes under efficient child psychologists the Russian leaders (partly unconsciously) were aware of a growing situation that required attention. For it is a well-authenticated fact that no children can receive adequate guidance in a home controlled by external and internal tensions that act and re-act upon the parents.

Too often a discussion of divorce has been taken to mean an advocacy of that procedure. It is nothing of the sort usually. Divorce in most cases comes after everything else has been tried. It is an evidence that there is a lag in the culture relationships in the home as over against the advance in other external and related culture relationships. It is to be expected that in a country like India divorce and separation will decidedly increase in the next few years. It is true that not only women are assuming a new place in the national economy, but also men are finding a new outlook toward their social relationships, national and international.

The fundamental impulses in a marriage are dynamic. It is quite evident that society has regularized and controlled these impulses partially in the past. Now the former sanctions and safeguards are dissolving. The world of values is being re-estimated. In this stage of adjustment men and women are not sure what the things are which are most worth striving for. Nor are they sure of the methods that should be adopted in making the necessary shifts from old to new levels of worth. We are in the process of establishing new mores to meet the changed social climate. This, we know, is essential if society is not entirely to disintegrate. In spite of all emphasis upon separation of incompatible couples men and women will continue to live together. Just what the exact relationship will be we do not know. Marriage will remain but it will not be the same.

As an example of why we do not know where we are going, there is the ever-obvious and increasing control of the State over individual and social relationships. It is entirely possible that the State may come to have (indeed has in some countries now) as much power over the individual in marriage and out as was once exercised by the Roman Catholic Church before the days of the Reformation. Just what that will mean cannot as yet be clearly seen. We do know that the family as an economic unit is no longer necessary in the West, and is less and less necessary in the East. The growing independence of women is forcing the bonds of marriage to be constructed of mutual contributions and exchange on the part of husband and wife.

No one who thinks will regret the passing of the economic compulsions that held many families together in the past. Marriage is altogether too important a social element to be lived forever on the economic level as it has been in many so-called homes. Little social loss will be felt by the dissolution of bad marriages. The new marriage will be based largely upon the world doctrine of the worth of human personality—male and female.

Just as it has been said for the life-time of Christianity that the "Kingdom of Heaven is within" so is it being recognized in our world that the new authority for actions social and personal must come from within. Theoretical dogmas no longer are authoritative. The consciences of individuals have their place. Goodness and virtue—whether we like this or not—are set up these days in connection with behavior which conforms to present needs as we see them through our reasoning powers.

The thought to keep in mind is that the widespread discontent comes not from worse conditions than our fathers and mothers knew but from a recognition that things as they are no longer remain satisfactory. Marriage is affected by the discontent just as all other relationships are. America has always been the outstanding exponent throughout her national history of the value of human personality. That is one reason for the high divorce rate in America. It represents simply the attitude and belief that where love no longer exists marriage itself is dead; where there is discord there cannot be harmony.

A survey of conditions gives us as modern reasons for the tensions in today's married life in the West: sex maladjustment; lack of sufficient money to maintain desired levels of living; birth control, involving the size of the family; education and training of children; discipline in the family—whether mother or father shall dominate; place and type of residence; carelessness or excessive tidiness; restlessness of women, including their desire for activity outside the home; differing social ambitions of husband and wife; friendships and associations outside the home; interference of relatives; complexes built on mother or father fixation, as well as other emotional urges.

Just how soon social maladjustments in the Indian home will appear in any such proportion as they have appeared in the West is difficult to say. That some have already appeared can be readily discerned. It may be that India will find it possible to avoid situations now common in the West by a thorough-going study and analysis of social readjustment as changes become evidently necessary. The problem of modern marriage is, like most other social problems, one of world-wide implication and significance.

THE INDIAN CHRISTIAN MARRIAGE ACT.—II.

Coercion, of course, is reprehensible, especially in marriage, and must be discouraged by all fair and reasonable means, whether it is applied by Christian parents to their minor children or by the whole community to its adult members. To understand, however, the bearings of the claim that the former should be dealt with as a crime under Section 68—punishable with 10 years' transportation or imprisonment, a few facts have to be carefully pondered.

Any Christian under 21 years of age is an infant in the eye of the law. Under the general law of India for the restraint of child-marriages, popularly known as the "Sarda Act", no female child under fourteen years, whether Hindu, Muhammadan or Christian, can be given away or taken in marriage even with her consent, without the parents and others concerned becoming liable to be punished with one month's simple imprisonment or fine or both. Therealpage age-limit for girls under the Christian Marriage Act is no higher.

It is a mistake, by the way, to suppose that the so-called "Sarda Act" was enacted exclusively for the Hindu community or that the latter has accepted it as being in its interest. Indian social reformers have welcomed it only because it is calculated to protect the health and human personality of all infant citizens of the State, at least up to a stage, against the tyranny of caste, creed or community. But, although the State is the supreme guardian of its infants of all ages, it has not ventured to enact any law, general or communal, to restrain the authority and discretion of the parents further, since their natural affection is the best guarantee that they would exercise them with proper thought for their children's good, suitably to their circumstances. The marriage of a Christian girl above 14 but under 21 years of age by her father is not a crime even under the Christian Marriage Act but is perfectly legitimate and lawful. Whether any particular arrangement he may make for her marriage with her apparent acquiescence, is to be viewed as a wise and proper act of parental discretion, or stigmatised as coercion, is largely a matter of personal opinion liable to be swayed by communal and religious prejudices.

In prosecuting people, however, under Section 68, nothing turns upon the question of girl's age or free consent. It is the Hindu priest's Hindu ritual that is the gist of the offence, even as conceived by the Madras High Court. With that ritual, the marriage of a free and independent adult Christian woman of forty is as much an offence in the eyes of the prosecutors as that of a coerced and helpless infant of fourteen. But if the same marriages be registered under the Christian Act any amount of coercion to that end does not lead to criminal prosecution.

A powerful gun designed to shoot down man-eaters may of course be employed, if one so chooses, to punish a cow which strays into one's compound or a sheep escaping from one's custody. It may also be successfully used to kill a disease-spreading fly or scare away the malarial pest. But it can hardly be reckoned as a proper weapon for such purposes. Far less can its inventor be credited with having had such uses in his mind when he designed it.

Is there no Bride of Lammar Moor anywhere in real life among Indian Christians today whose heart had been set against the choice of her parents and who yet had not the courage to speak out her mind even on her wedding day before the Registrar or Priest duly appointed by Government under the Christian Marriage Act? By what law were the cruel parents punished in her case? Why not apply the same law against those who force their girl to submit to Hindu ritual against her will?

It is significant that the Christian Marriage Act does not provide for the punishment of Christian parents under Section 68 for any offence whatsoever; not even for forcing their girl into concubinage, if any be so wicked. Coercion of any kind is obviously an offence that should be dealt with under the general criminal law of the land. At all events, the idea that it is an anxious concern for the protection of minor girls against parental compulsion that drives the Pro-prosecutionists to have resort to Section 68 did not find practical illustration in the cases that came up recently before the Sessions Courts.

The girl whose marriage provided the casis belli in the Ellore prosecution, for instance, had been born a Hindu. When the father turned Christian and submitted his infant Hindu child too for baptism, no Christian thought it an improper act of parental coercion. But when the same father turned away from the church along with the same daughter after she had grown up into a girl of fourteen, and got her marriage with her cousin solemnised with Hindu ritual, every male and female person who had anything to do with the marriage, were put in the lock-up under Section 68, not omitting even the bride. Could this have been due to the tender regard felt for this unfortunate infant as the victim of her father's high handedness? In the Guntur case the bride was admittedly 17 or 18 years old and quite capable of deciding for herself though technically still a minor. After the petition presented by her father to remove her name from the Church register had been disregarded by the Mission authorities, she herself sent a written notice by post that she had renounced Christianity. She passed also through a regular ceremony of Arya Samaj conversion before marrying her Hindu cousin. But action was taken nevertheless against her priest, her father, her husband and other relations under Section 68. Could it be with the benevolent desire and generous motive of championing her freedom of choice that this course was pursued to the bitter end until the Sessions Court came to their rescue?

There then remains but the charge of defiance and deliberate breach of the rule of the church. From the point of view of the offending Christian member this can only mean that he deliberately chose some other course of conduct and did not change his mind though admonished by his Christian elders. It is true that he cannot reasonably expect to escape the consequences of breaking the rules of order framed in the interest of the community. But the question is what shall be those consequences? There was a time in the history of Christendom when the interest of the community was held by the Church, with the support of the State, to require the dungeon, the rack and the gibbet or the stake to atone for the sin of non-conformity. But the times are now changed. Humanity and human freedom have become more important than dogma in public estimation throughout the world. Section 68 of the Indian Christian Marriage Act with its transportation and imprisonment of 10 years must be the grand-child of the Inquisition, if we are to regard it seriously as having been framed to punish those who prefer the Hindu ritual to civil marriage by a Christian Registrar. But there is really no Section in the Act empowering the criminal courts to punish Christians who may not choose to marry under it. As pointed out by Mr. Justice Walsh of Allahabad: "There is no express prohibition preventing a professing Christian from doing violence to his faith and marrying a non-Christian by a non-Christian ceremony. His marriage may not be valid by English Law as a Christian marriage in India, but it is not forbidden to him. It would be a startling result of the Act if such a person being free to choose and not prohibited from marrying otherwise than by a Christian marriage, should find himself liable to transportation for abetting the person who marries him!"

An Indo e French Poet:—Mon. Ponnou Nallatambi, a French and Tamil Poet of Pondichery, writes a Correspondent in the Hindu, has been nominated a member and the delegate of French India in the "Academe Jeux Floraux" of France as a Poet Laureate of French India. The official organ of the Academy has paid a glowing tribute to the new member of the Academy, in the course of which it says that Mon. Nallatambi is a great intellectual Indian scholar.

THE WORLD CRISIS AND BIRTH-CONTROL.

(By A. E. PENN.)

The present depression in trade being absolutely world-wide and sensibly affecting everyone, from plutocrat to pauper, a crisis, it is now recognised, has been reached, and the sooner the various governments of the world wake up to the fact that it is the natural outcome of procreation and mechanisation being unrestricted, and adopt measures calculated to minimise both, the sooner the crisis will pass; for, while commodities of every kind are abundant (hence their low prices), only a portion of the population of the world is engaged in the production and distribution of them, the rest being unemployed and, consequently, dependent on charity, public or private. But bred of the crisis, is the fear of war, and rather than reduce either, the governments seem determined to increase both, so that there may be no shortage of either "cannon fodder" or supplies (including armaments) when war does come; thus only bringing nearer that which they fear—war! Yet, there is little doubt that war breaking out as a result of the depression in the countries most seriously affected, would, with its sequels, famine and pestilence, terminate, practically, the state of things that now prevails and that may yet bring about such a war, namely, the disproportion that exists between population and employment, or the means of obtaining subsistence! In any case, it needs only to be stated to be seen, that population and mechanisation cannot go on increasing indefinitely, without ending in a catastrophe world-wide and unprecedented.

What, then, are the remedies to be applied? Obviously, those suggested by the ills themselves, namely, limitation of families and reduction in the use of machinery where human agency can be equally well employed (together with, perhaps, shorter working-days); thus ensuring, by the former, less increase in the number to be provided for (with necessities and, later on, work), and, by the latter, work for the unemployed.

And no less obvious than the remedies, to be applied, are the objections that will be raised to them coming as they will from those financially interested in mechanised industry in the one case and the leaders of organised religion (with its vested interests and political leanings) in the other. However, that the objections of the former, based as they will be on mere self-interest, cannot be admitted, it is hardly necessary to show. But those of the latter turning (as is already well known) on the ordinance of marriage, are more difficult to refute. Yet, that nobody is so good that there is no evil whatever in him (or her), is a proposition that none will dispute. This being so, it must also be conceded that (however much the proportions may vary individually) humanity is virtually divided into two great sections—one in which good predominates and the other in which evil is the dominant factor, in the individual. And as parties to all marriages belong to one or other of the two sections, not all marriages (in point of fact, infinitely few of them) can be such as those of which Christ said, "What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder", and concerning which Shakespeare wrote,

"Let me not to the marriage of true minds Admit impediments."

However, while there are many who, having sufficient material (and, perhaps, also spiritual) resources, have no need to worry about the possible consequences of sexual indulgence on marrying, the vast majority of people have perforce to choose between a life of singleness and a life of hardship and penury, with their attendant temptations to sin; and it is to such as these that birth-control offers a way out of the dilemma.

Birth-control, therefore, can not only be made a stepping-stone to individual advancement, spiritual as well as material, but seeing that there is such a thing as heredity, it, by keeping down the number of offspring of evil or unregenerate people, will tend to the improvement, spiritually, of the race as a whole!

As to the objection that the popularisation of birth-control will lead to an increase of immorality, it might just as well be urged that because knives are sometimes used for criminal purposes, they are an evil and should be banned as such. On the other hand, while abortion, suicide, and murder are often now committed, following on illicit (and even lawful) sexual intercourse, birth-control methods would preclude all such contingencies. And as to the bogey of "race-suicide", it is too absurd for words, based as it can only be on the assumption that contraceptives are infallible and that married people would have no children at all if they help it!

If any case, in a matter of fact world, in which the evil has to be provided for along with the good, as well as guarded against, a practical heaven must first be set up before a real one can be established. The question, therefore, is not so much, is birth-control an evil, as it is, which is the greater evil,—birth-control, or strife and misery of every kind, culminating in war.....Let the churches concerned make answer.

ANOMALIES OF HINDU LAW.

(By J. CHINNA DURAL)

First and foremost the Hindu Law is defective in point of time. Three thousand years have made a world of difference to India and it seems ridiculous at the present age to try to conform to modes and methods, faith and beliefs, and customs and manners of centuries before Christ. India has moved since then and moved so swiftly that should the graves by some freak of nature give up in flesh and blood the ancient authors of Hindu Law, they would sink back to their holes with fright at the sight of a land and peoples that they could not recognize!

The next most baffling and bewildering thing about the Hindu Law is its different schools and the consequent lack of uniformity. It was all right in those days when a province was a separate unit with no earthly chance of contact with the neighbouring provinces. Now they are all interlinked by means of rapid transport and communication with the result that the different schools have overlapped to such an enormous extent that the maintenance and preservice of different schools intact, and the application of special and exclusive laws to separate and different provinces have tended to cause confusion which is being made worse every day by inter-racial and inter-communal marriages, immigration of peoples from one province to another, the births of new religions, the adoption of new customs and manners, and the increasing change in the daily outlook on life. It is time the Bengal, Mithila, Benares, Bombay, Madras and the Punjab schools were completely scrapped and the broad divisions that they fall under, namely the Mitakshara, Dayabhaga and Mithila, were further reduced to one common uniform school to which the whole of India could easily conform without confusion.

In regard to the law of succession and inheritance, there is a great deal of confusion and ambiguity. It often arises with regard to tracing relationships from the propositus. The method of determining relations such as Sapindas, Sahulyas, Samanodaras, Sagotras, Samana Pravaras and Bandhus by means of what is known as the funeral oblations' of "Pinda Theory" must go and an up-to-date and modern method must be substituted. The Hindus are gradually discarding their caste marks and most of them are even giving up their daily "pujas". The "Pindas" therefore are also bound to go, if they are not already gone, sooner or later. How then is relationship going to be determined in the future? In a country like India where there are no such things as baptismal registers to record names or ages and where parents do not bother to record in writing the names of their own children for future reference or guidance, it is extremely difficult to trace one's relations up to the seventh or fourteenth degree as required by the Hindu Law for purposes of inheritance, marriage, mourning or adoption and the defect in the geneological tree affords great scope and temptation for an ambitious adventurer or 'impostor' to creep into the family tree as an agnate or cognate. It is such frauds, ambiguities, confusions and uncertainties that have unquestionably made India the most litigious country in the world. As for women there has been no attempt to improve their lot either as property holders, inheritors, wives, mothers or widows, and all the way through they play a passive part rather than an active part, and in many respects are treated more as chattel than human beings with a will of their own. Talk of 'equality of sexes' and 'fair play' for all! It is all moonshine according to the Hindu Law and till the Law that has doomed them to eternal serfdom and slavery is reformed there seems to be no hope at all for the women of India.

The Joint Family System deserves condemnation. It makes idlers in the family more idle and the ones with initiative and courage, less enterprising by its restrictions and cautious and meagre distribution of funds for domestic or business purposes. In modern parlance it is a sort of 'dole' which encourages 'unemployment' and breeds sluggish ways among its component members. The young man grows up to be a "ninny" with his eyes always fixed on the 'family property' and actually collapses when it is wrested away from him or he is wrested away from it! It is a system which often encourages the living of fifty or more members of one family in a small ill-ventilated, insanitary dwelling with no privacy or seclusion and with no earthly chance for thinking, studying, or developing one's individuality. The only 'recreation' of the members consists of quarrelling or squabbling over their respective shares. Can you wonder why the Indians have not had much time or opportunity for mechanical or industrial inventions!

The Hindu Law as we have seen is based primarily on religion. Inasmuch as religion is not uniform in India, there are bound to be irregularities in the law which originates from it. Superstitions in many instances have assumed the garb of religion and stealthily crept into it; customs of an objectionable nature have also found their way into it. Take for instance the question of sonship—There are fourteen kinds of sons! Son by a concubine, son born of an unmarried girl, and son born in secret are all embraced in the generous arms of Hindu Law. It is not the morality of it that worries one but the confusion arising when property has to be inherited. Similarly there are "approved" marriages and "disapproved" marriages and one of the "approved" forms of marriage consist of the giving away of the girl in lieu of fees to a bridegroom who officiates as priest in a sacrificial ceremony. Yet another "approved" form of marriage consists of the giving away of the girl by the father to a bridegroom in return for a pair of cattle! Of the "disapproved" forms of marriage two may be mentioned, namely: (1) The sale of a daughter and (2) the capture of a girl after her relatives have been killed or wounded. Polygamy, concubinage and child marriages are instances of further evils in Hindu Law that must be eradicated. The forbidding of inter-racial or inter-caste marriages and the deliberate tendency to keep down the Sudras and the depressed classes are also instances of injustice that are highly to be deprecated in the Hindu Law. The effect of all these, it may be noted, has been to split the Indian race into hundreds of sects, castes and divisions and keep them always apart in such a manner as to make them a disunited, disjointed nation incapable of combining or uniting for the common welfare of India. It is a thousand pities that India's backwardness and slow progress has after all got to be traced to its own self-imposed laws which have gripped her as it were in a vice and enslaved her these many centuries.

The jurists who have justified the existence and continuance of Hindu Law from time to time have argued that Hindu Law is never stationary but always advances with the times with every legislation and every decided case. It is a poor consolation to satisfy oneself on these lines because the legislature does not often dare interfere with the religion or the customs and manners of the peoples of India and what interference there has been from this quarter is totally negligible. As for 'decided cases' being a source of law and a help towards modernising the Hindu Law, they have certainly helped to increase the quantity of the Hindu Law but not the quality which is the same as it was in the days of Manu. The Bench have scrupulously clung for ages to the principles inculcated by Manu and his followers and the result is that apart from the fact of the law being stated more clearly in 'decided cases' there is no radical change so far as the law itself is concerned and the tendency of the Bench to cater for the religious, customary and superstitious idiosyncrasies of Hindu Law have been singularly marked and definitely pronounced. And what is more the heaps of decided cases which are often in conflict with one another and which have helped to swell the bulk of Hindu Law to a ridiculously monstrous size have added new difficulties and made confusion worse confounded. For instance for every "decided case" that a Counsel for the appellant cites before their Lordships of the Privy Council in order to substantiate a point of law, the Counsel for the respondent perhaps cites two or more "cases" in support of his contention which are diametrically opposed to that quoted by the Counsel for the appellant which only go to prove the conflicting nature of the "decided cases" and their lack of uniformity. They are certainly no help to the judges or the counsels and if anything they are a source of annoyance to the Bench and the Bar.

What then is the remedy?

I say emphatically modernise the Hindu Law, simplify it and standardise it. Scrap the unnecessary elements retaining only those that are absolutely useful and necessary. Purge it of all ambiguities and superstitions and customs and manners that are objectionable and let legislation play a free hand at giving it perfect trim. Codify the "Case Law" and reduce its bulk to the absolute minimum commensurate with legal requirements. Make it more secular and less religious. Strive at uniformity all over India and abolish all things that are out-of-date obsolete and that tend to retard India's progress. In a word, pull "Hindu Law" out of the rut into which it has fallen and give it a new start on modern lines, that it may be of real service to the India of to-day. Perhaps a commission of Legal experts can devise ways and means to draw up a scheme for the modernisation and standardization of Hindu Law. Why not bring such a commission into existence at once? It would be splendid if at the same time as the Supreme Court comes into being in the future Federal Constitution of India the new Hindu Law is also brought into effect. There is no question that the reformation of the Hindu Law is an urgent necessity and India awaits with eagerness the advent of a modern Manu.

INDIANS IN SOUTH AMERICA.

(BY PROFESSOR H. M. VON GLASENAPP).

I left Amsterdam on July 18th 1933 and arrived at Paramaribo, the Capital of Dutch Guiana, on August 2nd. After the abolition of negro slavery in 1863 the Dutch Government introduced in 1873 British Indians as "indentured labourers" into this colony. The descendants of these immigrants form the great Indian community of Surinam, they number to-day 86,000, i. e., 23% of the total population of 158,000. Though most of the Indians wear European dress, the Indian influence is very conspicuous in the country, as can be seen from the many Devanagari inscriptions on the shops and the many temples and mosques. Indians generally follow agricultural pursuits, both as labourers and as landowners. There are also many Indian merchants, but the Indian "intelligentsia" is very small. Among the Indians Hindustani is widely spoken, even by the Tamils. Some Indians also know Dutch, but only a few know English. As soon as my boat arrived in the harbour, the leading members of the Indian community, Mr. Raghubar Singh, President of the "Bharat Uday" Society, Mr. Radhakishnan, Mr. Abdul Gafur and Mr. Chetram Singh took me in a motor car to the beautiful house of the "Bharat Uday", the so-called "Lachman Singh Dharmasala", where I had to address the members. The next day I was shown three mosques, the temple, "Arya Divakar" (Arya Samaj) and the great Mandir of the Sanatana Dharma. I met many pundits and sanyasis, some of them Kabirpanthis. In the evening I delivered a lecture (in Hindi) in the largest hall in the town, the so-called "Stadszending", that belongs to the Moravian Brothers' Mission, but was hired by the Indians for that evening. The hall was overcrowded, I was introduced by Mr. Biswamitra, an Indian teacher, who is a Member of the Legislative Assembly of the colony. I spoke then on the importance of Hindu literature and philosophy in world culture and on the influence it had on German thought. I enjoined on my hearers the necessity of always maintaining the cultural connection with the mother country and of never forgetting, even so many miles away from India, the lofty ideals of the Ramayana and the Bhagavadgita. A thundering applause followed my words and several speakers thanked me for my lecture.

The next day I visited during the morning hours the Catholic and Protestant Missions, that work amongst the Indians. In the evening I was entertained with an Indian dinner by Mr. Chetram Singh and was honoured by a beautifully written "abhinandana-patra".

I then went to Georgetown, Demarara, the capital of British Guiana. The Indian influence in this colony is still greater than in Dutch Guiana, for among the 311,000 inhabitants of this vast, but still little populated, country, that is larger than Bengal or the Presidency of Bombay minus Sindh, there are 132,000 Indians (that is 43% of the population.) Indians were imported after the abolition of the slave trade (1834) under the indenture system down to 1917. The majority of the Indians in Guiana are working on sugar estates, or are engaged in the rice cultivation. The greatest part of them are labourers, but there are also many plantations and estates in the possession of the Indians. A great number of them work as merchants, shop-keepers, agents, mechanics and artisans. Many Indian firms are of importance. There are also 12 Indian doctors and 10 Indian lawyers. All Indians, who can read and write Hindi or Urdu, are registered as voters, and Indians are members of the legislative and Executive Councils. As far as I am able to judge, British Guiana offers Indians so many opportunities that it will attract in future an increasing number of immigrants from the over-populated mother country. Thus British Guiana is destined to become a very prosperous Indian colony.

In Georgetown I was received on board by the wealthy Mohammedan merchant, Mr. Gajraj and by two Hindu priests, Mr. Ramsarup and Mr. Gangaram, who showed me the town and many Hindu temples, mosques and schools. In the evening I was the guest of the "Hindu Religious Society", which showed me the great Dharmasala in Albuystown. This is a very fine institution. It embraces a temple, a school, a minister's residence, a three-storeyed orphanage and a great refuge for the homeless. The latter has 300 inmates, who are housed and fed free of charge. All the expenses are met by voluntary donations from the members of the Indian community. In the temple I was received with great solemnity, was crowned with wreaths and honoured with a beautifully written "manya-patra". I had to deliver two addresses, one in Hindi and one in English.

The next day the British Guiana East Indian Association held a reception for me, on which occasion I delivered a speech on Indian emigration of the ancient times and of to-day. I was again showed many temples (some of them with very fine ancient images and Sanskrit texts). In the evening I was entertained by Major Bain Gray, Director of Public Education. His Excellency Sir Edward Denham, K. C. M. G., K. B. E., the Governor of the Colony, invited me to lunch at the Governor's palace. I was also the guest of Mr. Gajraj and Mr. Kwall and other prominent members of the Indian community.

During my one-day's stay at Port of Spain (Trinidad), I was also very hospitably welcomed by the Indian leaders of this island. Mr. Syed Mahammad Hossein, the President of the Anjuman Sunnat-ul-Jamand, Mr. Hazeer Rookm-ud-deem and the Brahmin C. B. Mathura took me round in a motor car to see the beautiful mosque built by Haji Gokul and the famous Hindu temple of Tunapuna, where Shiva and Shakti are worshipped. The Indian community of Trinidad is the largest one in this part of the world, for not less than 139,000 Indians have found a new home in the island. They form 33 per cent of the population of the colony. The majority of the Indians are engaged in agricultural pursuits, but there are also many Indian merchants. Indians enjoy full municipal and political franchise, and are of primary importance to the economic life of the colony owing to their diligence and industry.

After having finished this first part of my journey I wrote my views and experiences in an article, "The Indians in Guiana and Trinidad," which has been published in the meantime in the German magazine, "Ibero-amerikanisches Archiv," October 1933.

From Port of Spain I went to La Guaira (Venezuela) and was the guest of the German minister in Caracas. I then spent a few days in Curacao to wait for the boat, with which I had to continue my journey. I then passed through the Panama Canal; called at Buenaventura (Colombia) Guayaquil (Ecuador) and the Peruvian ports of Paita and Salaverry and spent a few days in Lima to study the antiquities of the Inca age and the problems of Japanese immigration. I continued my journey along the West Coast viz Arica, Antofagasta, Huasco, Coquimbo and arrived at Valparaiso, the beautiful port of the Republic of Chile on the 9th September. Here I delivered a lecture in French on "La pensee Hindoue a travers les siecles" (Indian thought in the course of the centuries) in the University of Santiago and a lecture on "Religion and Society in India" in the German Association. In 36 hours I then crossed the Andes and went to Buenos Aires (Argentina). Here I delivered two lectures in German (on Indian Nationalism and on Indian Emigration) and one in Spanish on "Indian Thought," the latter in the over-crowded largest hall of the University. I also lectured on Indian religions in Rosario and la-Plata. Then I spent three days in Montevideo (Uruguay) where I lectured in German (on Indian Thought) and in Spanish ("Elpensamiento indos en el curso de los siglos"). In three days I travelled by steamer to Santos (Brazil) and then by rail to Rio de Janeiro. Here I stayed for a week as guest in the house of the German Ambassador, Dr. Schmidt-Elskop, and delivered one lecture in German on "Indian Emigration" and two lectures in French (La pensee Hindoue a travers les siecles) in the Academy of Brazil.

I left Rio de Janeiro on the 11th October and arrived at Hamburg on the 28th October 1935.

THE SEVA SAMITHI*

(BY PANDIT HRIDAYANATH KUNZRU.)

The Seva Samithi was organised towards the end of 1914 by the late Mr. Gokhale, with a view to carry on social work. Though the Servants of India Society did some social work in addition to its political work, Mr. Gokhale felt that in order to popularise social work and in order to take advantage of the services of those who either could not take part or were not interested in political work, it was necessary to have another organisation at work. The approach of Hardwar Kumbha Mela in 1915 provided an opportunity and the Seva Samithi was started. Knowing by experience the way in which poor pilgrims were treated by the Police and the Railway authorities, they organised a band of trained volunteers to help ignorant villagers at the bathing ghats at the railway stations and at other places. The work was performed by volunteers with such enthusiasm that they felt that Seva Samithi provided just that new avenue for public service, that the people stood in need of. The movement gradually spread not only all over U. P. but also in Punjab and Berar. The organisation soon became the means of creating a bond between the masses and the educated classes. The Seva Samithi at first encountered difficulties at the hands of the authorities, but they were able to overcome those difficulties and subsequently the Police and the Railway authorities began to utilise the services of the Seva Samithi volunteers gladly. "Wonderfully efficient and for that reason a danger to Government and required to be watched" was the opinion expressed by the Inspector-General of Police, U.P., in 1918, regarding the volunteers. By patient work they had now been able to secure a distinct position in the social life of Northern India. But in spite of their best efforts owing to the vast area that had to be covered, they had not been able to help all those who were constantly asking them to guide them.

*Substance of an address delivered in Madras on 30th December.

The Samithi was engaged in different kinds of activities, educational work, medical relief, work amongst the Depressed Classes, uplift work amongst the hill tribes, etc. Medical relief work was done by the Samithi at various pilgrim centres as well as the activities of the Samithi Hospital at Allahabad, worked by honorary doctors on the lines of European hospitals. The hospital provided poor men with medical relief and medical graduates the necessary experience. I have no doubt that the hospital would become a premier hospital of its kind in Northern India.

Of the Seva Samithi Boy Scouts movement, their experience at Melas made them realise that if young men in colleges could be taken on hand a few years earlier and if some means could be found for giving them a bias towards public service while they were very young, they would become potent instruments for rendering service to the country. In those days, Indians were not being admitted into the Baden Powell Association. Therefore, when Pandit Sriram Bajpai joined the Servants of India Society in 1918, they utilised his service to form Boy Scouts Association. The Boy Scouts Association was entirely independent of Seva Samithi. Seva Samithi trained workers with the object of getting a particular kind of work done, whereas Scout training was primarily educational. The service the Scouts might be called upon to do was valued for the sake of the opportunity provided by such service for the mental development of the children. The obstacles placed in the way of the Boy Scouts Association were even more serious than those placed in the way of Seva Samithi. Those obstacles were also overcome and they had now secured a status equal to that of the B. P. organisation and also secured all the facilities afforded by Government to that body.

It might be asked, now that the B. P. Association admitted Indians, what was the need for the separate existence of Seva Samithi Scouts Association? The Seva Samithi Scouts Association did not function in a spirit of antagonism or rivalry to the other Association. But they had distinct features of their own. Lord Baden Powell had laid down that the object of scouting was to enable young boys to grow up into healthy and energetic citizens and to induct them with a love of service to their country. Patriotism, independence of mind and passion for public service were the characteristics which ought to distinguish Scouts. The Samithi attempted to present these principles of scouting in a national garb which would be thoroughly appreciated and in a manner which would make people regard scouting as part of the national work. So the first step they took was to include the promise 'to serve the country' in the Scout promise. Therefore the Samithi Scouts came to feel that they were not part of the official system and that they were being trained to be servants of the motherland. Their second feature was the introduction of scouting in villages and, by writing books on scouting in Urdu and Hindi, enabling villagers with no knowledge of English to get themselves trained for public service. The third feature was the introduction of Indian songs and Indian stories dealing with the glories of their country and the achievements of their countrymen. In these and many other ways they had done their best to create a link between scouting and their national work. The Scout Movement was part of the youth movement and if the Youth Movement were to strike root and if it were to be looked upon as an indispensable part of their national life, it was necessary that its leadership should be in the hands of Indians. Children did not want to live in the drab reality. They wanted to see visions of a new world and see themselves to be principal actors in it. They should take advantage of this fundamental principle in children and use it in order to develop a strong and healthy nation. And scouting did so. It was an education in the highest and largest sense of the word. It was there to fight for the oppressed and down-trodden, to fight for the rights of the nation both in the political and social fields, to be the champions of the weak both against foreigners and against their countrymen and it was because of these untold possibilities of nation-making on this movement, that he would appeal to them to come to their assistance and enable them to spread it in the whole of Western and Southern India.

A SCHOOL AT STUTTGART.

(By Mrs. KIRAN BOSE.)

The first institution I visited on my way to Stockholm was the "Free" Waldorf School at Stuttgart. It is free in the sense that it is not bound by the State curriculum, and free too in the sense that it is not supported financially by the State, but is dependent on its own resources. The School was founded in 1919 by a Councillor of Commerce. The idea of the School is to bring about a solution of the social question—consequently the spiritual question as well of our times—to bring about a fundamental change in the way of thinking. One must begin early with the child's education, and a new method of education must be used. This School differs vitally from the ordinary schools. It has its special characteristics of psychological and educational bases, and tries to understand, in its deepest and innermost being that peculiarity in divided life which one recognizes in it.

The Waldorf Astoria factory sets aside a fund for the foundation of a school for the children of the factory workers and employees. In 1919, Dr. R. Steiner gave his first lecture in the Waldorf Astoria Factory and aroused true enthusiasm in all who heard the gospel of social service. A teachers' preparatory course was held in August; and in September, 1919 the opening ceremony of the School took place, at which Dr. Steiner gave the inaugural address on the following theme: "A living science, a living art, a living religion—that is true education, that is true teaching."

The School is now economically independent of the Waldorf Astoria Factory, and it now pays the fees of its own children. The pupils number over a thousand, who, since the School ceased to be a Factory school, are drawn from all classes of the community. The School is in no way exclusive, and no attention is paid to differences in social standing. The boys and girls go through twelve classes, and at the end of the twelfth class, take the school-leaving examination. The school rooms are bright and healthy, and all suitable arrangements are made for the various kinds of instruction. For the teaching of physics and chemistry, for music and eurhythmics, for handicraft, book-binding and technical instruction, there are special rooms with equipments. There is a library and the School has also a good gymnasium and an Assembly Hall.

Rudolf Steiner lays great responsibility upon the educator. A teacher and educator generally takes into consideration the growing human being between the ages of 6 and 14, and at the most up to the 21st year. Dr. Steiner insists on the necessity of keeping in mind—in every educational measure—the whole of the earth-life of the human being.

Steiner divides the child's life into four distinctive parts. (1) The Physical Body. (2) The Life Body or Etheric Body. (3) The Sentinel or Astral Body

(4) The Ego Body, the bearer of the higher soul of Man, the I. At the time of birth all the four bodies do not stand at the same stage of development, and the knowledge of these stages of development is a necessary foundation of true education. Steiner's educational theory recognizes the change of teeth and puberty as two milestones in childhood's development, and demands special educational methods for the periods, each being treated according to its own peculiar nature.

During the first period, the physical organs must be brought to a certain form. What has been neglected before the seventh year can never be made good. In this period of life, moralizing and appeals to reason are useless; what the teacher does is alone effective; whatever goes on in the surroundings of the child, whatever can be observed by the senses, be it moral or immoral, intelligent or foolish, will be imitated by the child. It is then the duty of the teacher to set such an example that its echoes in after life can result in nothing but good. What a heavy responsibility rests with parents and teachers in the face of the fact that everything to which the child reacts enters into his blood circulation, into his digestion, and so forth, and becomes thus the foundation for his later condition of health. The formation of the physical and organic constitution becomes the foundation of health or disease in later life.

The child from the time of the change of teeth to adolescence: In the first period the child has imitated what has happened in his surroundings; he begins to dream vaguely about them. He makes pictures about them; he is quite absorbed in a picture life. Therefore, the instruction at this stage should be through pictures. This, however, is true of every subject,—even of arithmetic and languages. In this period, the child desires to have everything imparted to him in artistic form. He should be allowed to busy himself with colours; painting should lead to drawing, drawing to writing, writing to reading. "The child instinctively responds to everything presented in rhyme, rhythm and measure." Hence great attention is paid to recitation, music and eurhythmics in the Waldorf School. The artistic element enters into the arrangement of all the subject-matters taught. Thus Dr. Steiner thinks that it is not the clever people who make an impression on the child from 7 to 12 years, but the lively, lovable, and artistic people, who go through life with freedom, yet with good sense. The teacher must always make use of the rhythmic systems—for the reason that they are not tiring.

What is of the greatest importance for education is to realize that we shall never help the child by giving him moral maxims; for these are empty sounds for him. We shall help him only if we ourselves stand for him as unquestionable authority. It is the teacher himself whom the child would call the true; the beautiful and the good. Just as for the first year of childhood, imitation and example are the magic words of education so for the years of this second period, the magic words are Discipline and Authority. One important characteristic of this system of teaching is the postponement of imparting knowledge of the elements of writing, reading, and arithmetic.

Dr. Steiner was convinced that the six and seven years old child must be spared the learning of formal writing. For learning to read early leads into abstraction for removed from real life, and makes the child prematurely old. During this period, the human and natural surroundings are bound up with the child. But at the age of 9, the child stands before a kind of life riddle. He becomes aware that he is an individual and as such he is separated from the external world. Until now he has flitted through it without a thought. Now he feels his isolation not in a conscious way, but through all sorts of doubts and unrest. He becomes more independent. The child feels the need to know the world and his teachers from a new angle, from another side; he must now consciously honour where previously he loved childishly. It is this age that makes the greatest demand on the wisdom and tact of the teachers.

Towards the twelfth year the child develops an understanding for Cause and Effect. The teacher can gradually begin to work with this new faculty. He is ready to make independent judgments on all that he has learnt. Steiner declares that man can hardly have a greater wrong done to him than to have his independent judgment aroused too early in life. The faculty of logical thinking and independent judgment has now fully developed the faculty of successfully studying deep human problems. The heart of the young being is filled with warm love for the world and for mankind. The inclination to form intimate friendships and friendly alliances becomes stronger. Just as formerly whatever the teacher called fine or nasty, good or bad, was the law by which he acted, so now he advances to the recognition of duty, and approaches the stage of freedom, where duty means "to love what man commands himself."

There are about 50 teachers on the staff of the Waldorf School. Dr. Steiner was responsible for most of their appointments; they come from all parts of Germany, Austria, and the Baltic Provinces. At his call they left places of security and good prospects to follow the most basic of all professions. All came to practice the system of pedagogy given them by Dr. Steiner for the well-being of humanity, to educate and teach the young with the aim of overcoming the materialism of the age and of building up a new manhood, centred in the divine and eternal, and fitted for every good work.

NEWS OF THE WEEK

Muslim Divorce Bill:—A report published in the Press that a Bill relating to Muslim Women's claim for divorce and separation has been introduced by Khaliluzzaman Siddiqi in the Hyderabad Legislative Council is authoritatively denied, as no such Bill has yet been introduced in the Council.

The late Dr. A. Abhayambal:—Dr. A. Abhayambal, whose death took place a few days ago, was professor of Economics and Principal, Maharani's College for Women, Mysore. After completing her studies in Mysore, she went to England where she obtained the Ph.D degree of the London University on a thesis on the subject of "the State in Relation to Economic Development in Mysore". She was an expert singer and Vina Player.

Urdu Conference at Gwalior:—It has been decided to hold an All-India Urdu Conference on a large scale at Gwalior during February 1934. This is the third time that an All-India Literary Conference is going to be held at Gwalior. The All-India Marathi Conference was held here in 1928 and the All-India Hindi Sahitya Sammelan in December 1932. All sections of the public are united in trying to make the Conference a success. A number of prominent Urdu poets and scholars has been invited and is expected to attend the Conference. Col. Sir Kailas Narain Haksar has been elected the Chairman of the Reception Committee and has issued an appeal to the public to help in making the Conference successful.

Mr. Subhas Bose Studies Fascism:—A Reuter's telegram of December 29, says that Mr. Subhas Chandra Bose explained the objects of India's Youth Movement in an interview to the "Giornale Italia," according to the "Morning Post." Mr. Bose said that it aimed at absolute independence outside the political and cultural programme of the British Empire. "Our propaganda will be concentrated on three potent national groups, in which Mahatma Gandhi is not interested himself, namely, the youth, labour and peasant movements. Mr. Bose added the action of the group felt more than ever the need of studying Fascist methods. Mr. Bose is visiting Rome in connections with the Asiatic Students' Conference.

French Lady Tourist at Allahabad:—Madame Morin, a French tourist who is on a visit to India, arrived at Allahabad this afternoon and is the guest of Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru. She was entertained at a tea party by Pandit Hriday Nath Kunzru and the members of the Servants of India Society this evening in the Society Hall and among other guests present at the function were Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru, Pandit Jawaharlal and Mrs. Kamala Nehru, Pandit Iqbal Narain Gurtu, Dr. Asthana and Dr. Katju. After tea the guests were entertained to a programme of delightful music and dance, the dance performance being given by Miss Asha Kumar Ojha and Mr. Vibhuti Bhushan Bajpai, B. A.

The Asiatic Student Conference:—The following is from the Royal Italian Consul-General:—In opening the conference of the Asiatic students in Rome Sgr. Mussolini gave a discourse in which he declared—"Rome had already realized the Union of the West with the East 20 centuries ago by creating relations of reciprocal understanding with the countries of the East then known. Subsequently between Asia and Europe every spiritual link ceased; the European States were not able to understand Asia which was only considered as the market for their industrial products and the source of raw materials. Against these capitalistic and materialistic ideals Italian Fascism reacts for the strength of the spiritual elements of the Asiatic Nations. New Italy is, therefore, eminently able to reassume her unifying function between Europe and Asia and her proper millenary tradition of constructive collaboration." This message of the Duce caused a profound impression among those present who were over 500, mostly Persians, Arabs, Indians and Syrians. The Congress of the Asiatic students which closed on 27th December has decided to establish in Rome a centre of a Confederation of Asiatic Students with permanent offices in Rome and its own monthly Review.

President Baroda Oriental Conference:—Born in 1882 at Mirzapore in the United Provinces, which is his home, Mr. K. P. Jayaswal will be the youngest President of the Oriental Conference though in achievement second to none of those who preceded him, says the Amrita Bazar Patrika. Mr. Jayaswal's two monumental works are now in the list of text-books of many Universities namely "Mann and Yajnavalkya" and "Hindu Polity." In his latest work, "History of India, from 150 A. D. to 850 A. D." which was just published, Dr. Jayaswal has brilliantly illumined the so-called 'Dark period' of Indian history which even the late Sir Vincent Smith, Professor Rapson and others failed to peer through and in despair dubbed as complete "Blank." In this Mr. Jayaswal has rescued from their unmerited oblivion two great lost empires preceding that of the Imperial Guptas completely unsuspected by historians so far, and besides, has thrown a flood of new light on the history of South India and Insulinidia or the over-seas colonies of ancient India. Yet another "History of India" by him from the time of the Buddha to the beginning of the Pala period based on a hitherto untapped Buddhist source whose authenticity Mr. Jayaswal has conclusively proved, is already in the Press.

Mysore and the Vatican:—A Mysore Government press note issued to-day gives publicity to the following cables exchanged between His Holiness the Pope from Rome and H. H. the Maharaja of Mysore. A cable dated 19th December 1933 from His Holiness the Pope, Citta del Vaticano, Rome (Italy) to His Highness the Maharaja of Mysore, stated: "Please accept our keen satisfaction at your Highness's recent act of benevolence towards your Catholic subjects in presiding at the laying of the cornerstone of Saint Philomena's Church in Mysore. As a token of our appreciation, we send you through the Apostolic delegate, a gold medal, commemorative of this Holy Order and invoke God's blessings upon your Highness, your family and your subjects." The following is the reply cable from His Highness the Maharaja of Mysore to His Holiness the Pope dated 28rd December, 1933:—

"I thank your Holiness very heartily for your telegram which has afforded me deep gratification. The blessings and good-wishes of your Holiness are very precious to me and the gold medal, which you have been good enough to send me will always be a very pleasing reminder of the great interest manifested by your Holiness in me, my family and my subjects."

Women in Underground Mines:—In India, according to the Report of the Chief Inspector of Mines, in 1932, out of a total of 204,558 workers working in mines of all kinds which come under the Indian Mines Act, underground workers totalled 110,907, of which 96,196 were men and 14,711 were women. The latter figure, however, has been steadily decreasing. In March 1929, the Government of India issued Regulations which came into force on 1st July 1929, under which no woman is permitted to enter or remain in the underground workings of any mine other than an exempted mine, unless she is authorised to do so in writing by the Chief Inspector. The exception is intended to provide for cases where a lady doctor, a lady inspector or a lady visitor may wish to enter a mine from the underground workings of which women are excluded by law. In the exempted mines, that is to say, the coal mines in Bengal, Bihar, Orissa and the Central Provinces, and the salt mines in the Punjab, the prohibition of the employment of women underground is to become operative by successive stages over a period of ten years, so that by 1st July 1939 the exempted mines will be subject to the rules applied to other mines, from 1929; that is to say, by that date the practice of employing women underground will have been totally abolished.

Harijan Seva Sangh:—Mr. A. V. Thakkar has issued the following Press Note: The Central Board of the Servants of Untouchables Society resolved at its meeting recently held in Delhi, that the name of the Society be changed to the Harijan Seva Sangh. All the branches, provincial and district, of the Society and the public at large are requested to take note of the change.

Dr. Tagore in Hyderabad:—A reception was given to Dr. Rabindranath Tagore on the 21st December at the City College, Hyderabad, Mr. S. M. Azam, M.A., (Cantab), Principal of the college, welcomed the distinguished guest. He said that the teachers of Hyderabad were anxious to offer their respectful homage to the world teacher, who inspired the youth of the land with ideals such as no other teacher could. Dr. Tagore's ideal was the realisation of international brotherhood, and such an ideal could not be attained without nationalism in the first instance. Mr. Azam declared from his personal knowledge that no two Indians have done so much to raise the prestige of India as Mr. Gandhi and Dr. Tagore. Dr. Tagore opened his address with the remark that he was not qualified to address a gathering of teachers, for he had been a truant in his school days, and was glad of it because his reckless youth had enabled him to preserve a mind sensitive to the touch of life. For forty years he had toiled in a field of rocky soil. The educational system in existence to-day in India was an artificial method calculated to provide for the "white man's burden", and although India should be grateful to the West for its gifts of philosophy and science, educational endeavour had on account of the impact between the two countries been divorced from aesthetic life of man. He emphasised the importance of music and arts in educational institutions.

NOTES

The Political Outlook:—The political position at the beginning of the new year is one of confusion. The Joint Parliamentary Committee finished its enquiry some days back. The Indian delegates have all returned. A lengthy note by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru, pointing out the main defects of the White Paper scheme as they struck him when he left London six months ago, has been issued as also a joint statement by the British Indian delegates who remained to the end. Of the two, the former is the more elaborate. Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru has a clear and definite idea of the kind of constitution which is needed to meet the requirements of the country at the present day. These may summed up under three heads: The first and foremost is that the Indian should be able to stand forward as a self-respecting citizen before the world; No constitutional reform, however sincerely conceived and skilfully drafted, has a chance of being given a fair trial which does not fulfil this important condition. The present relation between the two countries is degrading to the one and humiliating to the other. The second requirement is that there should be adequate guarantee in the reforms to ensure that Government policies particularly in economic and defence matters, are conceived and carried out in the interests primarily of this country. The third is that there should be secured sufficient resources at the commencement of the reforms to finance the educational, sanitary and other nation-building subjects which have been lamentably neglected so far. The principle of Federation has ceased to evoke serious opposition, it being recognised that if the States are not with the rest of India they will be against it. A considerable preponderance of opinion in this country regards the White Paper scheme as a small reform which will prevent the adoption of larger reforms in the not distant future; and it will not, therefore, regret its rejection or withdrawal. The Liberals at their Federation in Madras a few days ago declared themselves in this sense. The Conference which Sir Chimanlal Setalvad and his friends are trying to convene in Bombay will probably take the same line. If, in spite of this all but unanimous indifference, the White Paper scheme comes to be adopted, the responsibility for its success or failure will rest entirely with the British Parliament.

An Important Judgment:—The High Court of Madras has given the deathblow to untouchability in that Presidency by its judgment in a case in which an Adi-Dravida woman sued a caste Sudra for maintenance for herself and her child by him. The man's defence would seem to have been that there can be no valid marriage between a caste Sudra and an untouchable under the Hindu law. Mr. Justice Anantakrishna Iyer decided that there was a legal marriage between the parties as the Hindu law applicable to Sudras sanctioned intermarriage between their different sections. The learned Judge argued that Adi-Dravidas were admitted to be Hindus and that in recent cases in Madras and elsewhere it had been held that marriages between sub-castes of Sudras were not invalid. His lordship assumed that if the Adi-Dravidas are Hindus, they must be Sudras. If this judgment stands, untouchability so far as Southern India is concerned would be irrevocably abolished. The vast majority of the Hindus in South India are Sudras and the bar against intermarriage which at present is the only important surviving barrier between different castes, would cease to exist between them and the Adi-Dravidas. The only people who would be affected by the current prejudice will be the microscopic minority of Brahmins, and they do not count nowadays. There was recently reported a marriage between a South Indian Brahmin and an untouchable girl. Probably it was solemnised under the Gour Act which permits Hindus to intermarry without reference to caste and subcaste. The Harijan is a Hindu as much as the Brahmin and the Gour Act applies to both of them. The importance of the Madras decision lies in the fact that it declares that a marriage between a Sudra man and a Harijan woman is valid even under Hindu law. Mr. Justice Anantakrishna Iyer's judgment, however, leaves in doubt whether a marriage between a Sudra woman and a Harijan man would be also valid. "Even if the directions laid down in Hindu law that a man could not validly marry a woman of a higher caste should be assumed to apply to a marriage between members of the different sub-divisions of the Sudra caste," said the Judge, "it was admitted in the present case that the class and status of the man was higher than that of the wife." This judgment is as important as that of the late Sir Lalubhai Shah of the Bombay High Court affirming the validity of anuloma—along the grain—marriages among Hindus, as a landmark in the modern evolution of Hindu society.

India in the War:—People in this country are sometimes surprised at the answers given by the Secretary of State for India to questions in Parliament on Indian affairs. They are often so different from facts as they are known here. The explanation may be found in the scathing chapter in the second volume of Mr. Lloyd George's "War Memoirs" on the Mesopotamian Expedition during the War. The Government of India of the day was, it is clear, anxious not to involve India in the European struggle. India had no quarrel with Germany. She was not under a Treaty obligation to go to the defence of Belgium. The German invasion of Belgium did not threaten any interest of India and it would have mattered very little to her if France or Germany came on the top in their contest for the hegemony of Europe. These reasons—and they are weighty—must have been present to the Government of India in its endeavour to keep this country out of the War. It is also likely that Government foresaw that the prestige of the White races, which counts for so much in the East, would be impaired if Indian troops participated in a fight between two kindred European nations. The Government of India hung back as long as it could and even when it was compelled by orders from above to take charge of operations in Mesopotamia against the Turks, it did so without much enthusiasm. All the resources of redtapeism were utilised to delay, evade or put off giving effect to the directions of the War Cabinet. But the letter from the Military Secretary of the Commander-in-Chief to the Military Secretary to the Viceroy, which Mr. Lloyd George quotes (Vol. II p. 823), shows that the authorities in this country were obliged to practise what he does not hesitate to call deception, in order to do their duty by this country as they conceived it. Mr. Lloyd George implicitly assumes throughout his Chapter on "the Mesopotamian Muddle" that India and her whole population are body and soul at the disposal of the British Government for the time being.

Baroda Social Legislation:—There is an impression abroad that social legislation in Baroda State has been pushed forward too rapidly in pursuance of certain a priori ideas without reference to the needs of society. A perusal of the memorandum on recent social legislation in Baroda prepared by Mr. V. K. Durandhar, Legal Remembrancer of the Baroda Government, which we published in the last issue, goes far to remove this wrong impression. The reforms embodied in the new laws relate to keenly felt anomalies in the Hindu law not only in Baroda but also in other parts of India. Careful investigation by representative committees has in every case preceded the introduction of legislation and it will be seen that the amendments in the Hindu Law are all within the framework of the Hindu social system. No violent changes have been made in the Hindu joint family and the enlargement of the rights of women may have really the effect of strengthening it, though Mr. Durandhar would seem to expect the contrary. In keeping with this policy of continuity, it will be well perhaps to avoid as much as possible censorious terms such as 'tyranny' in the statute-book. The so-called Caste Tyranny Act to which His Highness has recently given his assent, is really a very mild measure as explained by Mr. Durandhar, and not, as would seem from the title, a measure for the abolition root and branch of the caste system. Indeed, 'Caste Rehabilitation Act' would be a more suitable title as the reform effected will, by removing abuses, certainly restore caste to its true function.

The South Indian Swan.—The swan, according to an ancient Indian belief, has the singular quality of being able to separate milk from water. The South Indian public would seem to be possessed of a similar attribute. In last week's Reformer we referred to the even-handed cordiality of the welcome accorded by Madras to Lord Willingdon and to Gandhiji. We have since come across the resolutions of a caste Conference which, beginning with an expression of loyalty to the King and of gratitude to Government for some concessions, ended with exhortations for the use of Khadi and the removal of untouchability. While the leaders are waiting to evolve a formula, the masses have decided in favour of making the best of both Government and Gandhiji.

The Social Conference:—We publish this week the resolutions adopted at the Madras Social Conference. The resolutions are most of them moderate. About the only issue on which, according to the report, discussion was raised, was the untouchable one, some of the delegates urging that it should be directed against the caste system on the ground that as long as caste was tolerated outcastes were bound to exist. The resolution ultimately adopted confined itself to the uplift of depressed classes. As we pointed out last week the Conference was rather precipitate in deciding for Birth Control propaganda. The main trend of the discussions was, like that of other social conferences in the past, directed towards social uplift and educational reform work, though the Chairman of the Reception Committee had appealed in his address to the delegates, for a widening of the concept of social reform.

BOMBAY, JANUARY 13, 1934.

PROVINCIALISM AND ANARCHY.

The latest instance of anarchic violence in Chittagong shows that its adherents are growing more daring and desperate. Four Hindu youths, it is said, suddenly appeared on the European Club ground in Chittagong, where a cricket match was being played and a large crowd of Europeans had collected to witness it, and threw bombs at the Superintendent of Police who stopped them on suspicion and at others who came to his rescue. One of the four was shot dead by the police officer's chauffeur and the other three were captured. One of the latter has been identified as an absconder in the Armoury Raid which took place some years ago. There is nothing so fraught with menace to the moral and political progress of the country than this movement which involves the reckless and indiscriminate sacrifice of human life. Though at present it is confined to a small part of Bengal, it may at any moment extend to other parts of that province and of the country. It is a thousand pities that the sinister potentialities of this criminal movement are not realised by the Indian public. The tendency outside the affected districts in Bengal and in other provinces is to regard the issue as one between the Bengal Government and the population of those districts, in which no outsider is called upon to take an interest. This to some extent is due to the present clouding of the public mind by provincial and communal issues, but to a larger extent it is due to the attitude of the Bengal Government which is not calculated to enlist the support of public opinion in the country as a whole.

The measures adopted by the Bengal Government are cumulatively equivalent to the application of martial law. The severity of these measures may be judged from the prosecution reported last week of several respectable householders for not reporting to the Police the presence of Hindus between the ages of 15 and 30 who stayed with them as guests, as required by one of the special Orders in force in the affected area. These measures and others indicated by the phrase "quiet pressure" which the Governor of Bengal used in a recent speech, have been in force for some time and yet it is evident that the dangerous movement persists. The official view seems to be that by continuing these measures and stiffening them the movement can be completely wiped out. But how long will it take to reach that goal and at what cost? A more rational as well as expeditious way is to mobilise the vast amount of anti-violence opinion all over the country and to bring it to bear upon the active promoters and passive sympathisers with it in the districts affected Bengal. This can be done only if the matter is taken out of the hands of the Provincial Government and dealt with by the Government of India as an all-India concern, which it really is. It is unfair to the Bengal Government to leave it to its unaided resources in dealing with a phenomenon of such magnitude. It has not the means, even if it had the wish, to enlist the support of the people of other parts of the country to its measures.

This is the situation now. It will grow worse when the White Paper scheme of vivisectioning British India into eleven separate and autonomous provinces, comes to be adopted. The individual provinces, confronted by all-India propaganda, will be in the same position as some of the Indian States at present. The Government of India would cease to exist as a co-ordinating force. The intervention of the Federal Government will be resented as an infringement of autonomy. The disruptive forces will be everywhere in the ascendant. While much has been said of the safeguards to minorities and interests, very little consideration has been bestowed on the need of keeping British India intact as a bulwark against autocracy on the one hand and anarchy on the other. The Liberal Federation which met at Madras a few days ago, while it has drawn up a long list of changes which it would like to be made in the White Paper scheme, has completely ignored this fundamental defect. Every one says that it is a grave defect but adds that it is too late now to mend it. As a fact, however, this defect can be rectified with much less dislocation of other parts of the scheme than some of the changes on which its critics in this country lay stress as absolutely necessary to make the scheme acceptable to themselves. In a question of the future of the country, nothing can be "too late" if it is the right thing to do. The fullest autonomy can and should be given to the provinces by devolution from the centre. British India which has developed during the last century and a half, a certain unity of ideals and outlook should enter the Federation as a single unit. Members of the Federal Assembly will be elected by the different provinces but they will speak and act as members for British India as a whole. It has been objected that this involves the retaining of the name 'British India' for the largest unit of the Federation. We do not see any harm in it. It would be merely recognising the historical fact that British India has come to be as a result of British rule. But it will not be difficult to invent a more acceptable name for the territories that are now known as British India. This is a small matter.

HARIJAN SEVA SANGA AND CHRISTIAN MISSIONS.

Sometime back our esteemed friend the English Editor of the Dnyanodaya was so greatly impressed by the work of the Servants of the Untouchables organisation that he expressed the wish that Christian Missions which are also engaged in work, according to their lights for the same classes, might be allowed to co-operate with the Harijan Seva Sangh as the Society has been recently named. In reply we pointed out that the Seva Sangh has expressly excluded religious propagandism from its objects and that as the Missions place conversion to Christianity in the forefront of their objects, their cooperation was impossible. Gandhiji who was questioned at Jubbulpore, was more precise and he said that their cooperation was welcome provided they gave up the notion that Hinduism was inferior to Christianity and that conversion to Christianity was the best way of raising the position of the untouchables. We do not see what there is in it to provoke the vehement attack on Gandhiji for 'unconscious religious arrogance' in the Dnyanodaya this week. What Mr. Edwards wants, it now appears, is to be allowed to carry on the Missionary propaganda including the making of converts, under the auspices and with the resources of the Harijan Seva Sangh. Our Missionary friends are beginning to realise that in making mass conversions they had bit off more than they can chew. A sympathetic outside observer noted that the wheels of the Christian Church in India drag heavily in the sand of the agelong inferiorities and disabilities of the hundreds of thousands of the depressed classes who now form the bulk of the Christian population and which can only very slowly appropriate the new visions and think the new thoughts. (Report of the Commission on Christian Higher Education, p. 56.) Owing to the economic depression and the increasing knowledge of the real conditions of Indian religious and social life and owing to the growing disbelief in proselytising missions in their homelands, Christian Missions naturally wish to divest themselves of as much as of their responsibilities to their converts, without appearing to do so. This must have been the unconscious motive behind the naive proposal to cooperate with the Harijan Seva Sangh which in its origin and methods is a Hindu movement to remove from Hindu Society the blot of untouchability.

THE INDIAN ABROAD.

The Examiner, the Roman Catholic weekly of Bombay, writes under the above heading:—

When visiting Paris recently, Mr. K. Natarajan observed in a shop some pictures of women in a state of complete nudity, and he concludes:

"This is not regarded as obscene in Europe. The European view in matters of sex relationship is markedly different from that of Christian preachers and more nearly the same as that of the Indian people. Our missionary friends have exercised a sort of moral terrorism on Indian minds for the best part of a century while all the time they knew that things were much the same in their own homelands, if, indeed, not a little worse from their point of view."

We may remind Mr. Natarajan that missionaries do not come to India to make "Europeans" but to make "Christians." Christians do regard such pictures as obscene. Wherever possible they check the sale of pornographic objects, but in France precisely you have an anti-Christian Government which allows such things to be displayed. Decent people, however, simply do not gaze at them. Pagan semi-nudity in the East is very different. It is mainly due to the hot climate and people are accustomed to it. But in Europe these things are produced and sold simply to excite lust.

Again at Pompeii Mr. Natarajan inspected the pornographic pictures found in the brothels of the ancient Romans and here too he manages to drag in the Catholic Church. But no decent Catholic would want to see those pictures. If he knew what they were, he would simply decline to look at them. That is merely the normal Catholic practice in regard to pornographic objects. Mr. Natarajan was less scrupulous, but is it fair for him to make these pagan remains a grievance against Catholics, who are at least sufficiently prudent not to do what he did. "No worshipper who goes to a Hindu temple," he assures us, "thinks of inspecting the carvings on the walls." And yet Mr. Natarajan, with all the Christian art of Europe before him, has only time to visit the ruined pagan brothels of out-of-the-way Pompeii. Of Christian monuments he says not a word.

The Indian in the present case was not abroad as a connoisseur of art. The one or two things which he noted are those which thrust themselves on his attention by their flagrant contradiction of the Christian ideal as understood and preached by missionaries in India. As regards the attitude of the normal Roman Catholic, at least two of the party were of this denomination. As one of these was the guide he could not be said to be ignorant of what was within. I may assure the Examiner that my opinion of the European attitude to nudity was not formed on the strength of the pictures exhibited prominently on the street front in the Paris bookshop. God made man nude and those who regard nudity in itself as obscene are really criticising the work of the Creator. The distinction between European and Christian which the Examiner draws is only made when it is found necessary to extricate Christianity, never when the identification of the two is calculated to advance its propaganda. The question is not what the missionary wants to do with the Indian but what he actually succeeds in doing. I do not think and did not say that the French are less moral than Indians or any other nation because of these photographs. My "grievance" is that missionaries have needlessly sought to frighten non-Christians for things which are regarded as innocent in the lands which have been under Christian influence for centuries.

As regards the Pompeian relics, the Examiner may be reminded that the Catholic Church was brought in simply to contrast its treatment of the Elephanta sculptures and the Pompeian pictures so near its own door. I should add that I have a very great respect for the Roman Catholic Church and it was with great regret that we had to give up our intention of paying our respects to His Holiness the Pope owing to unavoidable conditions. THE RELIGION OF MAHATMA GANDHI.

Several books on Mahatma Gandhi have been published in recent years. The latest addition to Gandhi literature comes from the pen of Bishop Chitambar of Jubbulpore, "Mahatma Gandhi: His Life, Work and Influence." The main interest of this book which has been published in response to the demands of American friends and which is written for American readers, lies, however, in his discussion of the question whether Gandhi is or is not a Christian. The author publishes letters from Gandhiji to Mrs. Chitambar in which his religious position, in rejecting the idea that "spiritual satisfaction is obtained only in and through Christ and that the

* Published by the John O. Winston Company, Philadelphia. Price two dollars.

A truth lies only in believing in Jesus", is clearly defined. In view of this, it is surprising to read Mr. Chitambar's conclusion that he still has hopes of Gandhiji becoming a Christian in the orthodox sense. He remarks, however, that "sometimes Gandhiji seems to manifest the spirit of the Master more than some of us." It is a small matter, but it is amusing to note that in the dust-cover of this very book, in which Bishop Chitambar sets out to explain to the American public that Mahatma Gandhi is not a Christian, the publishers should have advertised the Bishop as a Hindu in one place, and as a Christian Hindu in another. Bishop Chitambar concludes with the statement that Mahatma Gandhi's religion is "Christianised Hinduism". Frankly we do not understand what he means by this. The publishers' description of Bishop Chitambar as a Christian Hindu has greater plausibility about it than the Bishop's ultimate estimate of Gandhiji's faith. "The very fact," he writes, "that Mahatma Gandhi has set himself the task of purifying Hinduism is an admission of the fact that Hinduism as such does not contain much hope for the betterment of the country." If we are to accept this we should be compelled to infer that Gandhiji's activities have as their goal, along with the Youth Movement and Self-Respect Movement, the eradication of all religions, particularly as he has expressed his repugnance to change his faith. We should like to know whether the Bishop is satisfied with "Christianity as such." The ultimate advice which the Bishop presents to the Christian Church, that she should demonstrate by her life that the Christian religion both satisfies and works, seems to us to imply that just as individuals in Hindu society are working for the eradication of certain evils, the Bishop himself feels that much leeway has to be made before the Christian religion can be called a living faith. Only, he has presented the truth in a much more palatable form to his fellow religionists than Gandhiji has been wont to do with the Hindus.

In the Author's Preface and in parts of the book, Bishop Chitambar has explained his political views which are of the Liberal School. In his last chapter he expresses with considerable tact the view held by responsible leaders in India, that the United States can make no direct contribution to the Indian struggle for independence. "America's message," he writes, "will be much more forceful and effective if she solves satisfactorily the racial question in her own country." As for the relations between Britain and India, besides expressing his faith in Dominion Status and in the infallibility of the methods of co-operation, the Bishop emphasises that India must be encouraged to push on her indigenous industry. In its presentation of the political situation and of Indian aspirations and ideals, "Mahatma Gandhi" is restrained but forceful. There is, however, one point which requires amplification. The Bishop writes on page 69: "His (Gandhiji's) followers had frequently had recourse to pistols and bombs but he claims non-violence, 'truth force' or 'soul force', to be his weapon." It is unfortunate that in an otherwise well-documented book this statement stands by itself. Generally speaking, Indian thinkers have been careful to distinguish between the terrorist movement and Congress activities—a distinction accepted even by Government in its annual Reports in the past. The volume is elegantly produced, but, besides the reference to the Bishop as a Hindu, there is a slip on page 47 where Gandhiji's return from South Africa is dated "1924" instead of 1914, which demonstrates the disadvantages of publishing a book by an Indian author on India in the United States.

THE INDIAN CHRISTIAN MARRIAGE ACT—III

We should be sorry to understand that, unlike the Christian Churches of North India which have to obey the Allahabad High Court, those of the South insist that they cannot afford to depend on Church penalties and excommunication alone for maintaining their internal discipline, as all non-Christian communities are obliged to do under British rule, but must needs have a privileged position wielding the extraordinary power of setting the criminal courts in motion to enforce the church's rule, and that too against non-Christians primarily. Absolute autonomy and freedom of action for themselves with the power of breaking down with deadly weapons the autonomous rights of other communities seems to be what is claimed for the Christian churches of South India. They must not only be allowed to help with impunity and shelter under the Christian Marriage Act members of the Hindu church who wish to defy and break the rules of order framed in the interests of the Hindu community; they must also have the power to carry fire and sword, as it were, into the Hindu camp if a Hindu priest does, according to caste usage recognised as valid by Hindu law, exactly what the Christian Marriage Registrar insists upon doing in defiance of Hindu law and custom.

Hindus of the school of thought represented and led by the Indian Social Reformer have no axe to grind against any community. While it is true that they do not feel ashamed of their Hindu birth nor despise their own cultural and spiritual heritage, nothing gives them greater pride and self-satisfaction than to note and acknowledge the points of excellence in the character, constitution and civilization of non-Hindu communities and try to be of service to all equally. We reckon ourselves among their humble admirers and camp-followers.

We therefore sincerely sympathise with the desire of the Christian churches that every Christian girl should be free from compulsion of any kind and that she should marry under a law which will ensure for her a valid married status, guarantee her future against suppression by a co-wife and secure for her and her female progeny rights of inheritance under the Indian Succession Act. We are no partisans of the Hindu priest; we are only anxious that every individual layman shall be free to choose his own priest. We shall not be sorry at all if the Hindu priest and his ritual are shunned by every Christian without exception and the Indian Christian Marriage Act is faithfully followed even for mixed marriages, though it is powerless against the personal law of the Hindu and bestows no greater rights upon the bride. We shall be happy to co-operate with the Christian community in any attempt to get that Act suitably amended and we shall be glad to have the support of all communities for the enactment of a general civil marriage law of an optional kind like the one of Dr. Gour's, which was opposed and rejected by the Government last in 1931 on the mistaken plea among others that the Christian community did not need it. (Vide the Reformer of 21st Feb. 1931, page 398; 16th May 1931, page 589.)

Even with the law as it is at present, it would be a great relief to us if such Christians as may feel drawn towards Hindu ritual and are determined to have a Hindu priest to officiate at their wedding would get it first registered as a civil marriage. Whether this is done under the Christian Marriage Act or the Special Marriage Act, it has the equal merit of putting Section 68 out of action automatically, leaving it no excuse to do mischief to participants in the subsequent ceremony. But the latter Act, owing to Dr. Gour's amendment, has the further merit of really giving to the bride all the secular advantages which die-hard partisans of Section 68 of the Christian Act profess to be their sole objective in pressing for the prosecution of the Hindu priest and his "abetting" clients.

These "offenders", however, are usually too ignorant to know the lurking dangers of Section 68 in the Madras Presidency, or the simple precautions by which it can be easily disabled. But even supposing that they are so self-willed and defiant as to disregard all warnings and deny the right of the Christian elders to fetter their freedom, and then plunge directly into the Hindu marriage ritual according to caste usage, relying upon it alone to effect a Hindu conversion as well as a Hindu marriage as was held valid by the Madras High Court in I. L. R., 83 Madras, are they to be punished by the State with heavy penalties because the Christian churches refuse to recognise the ceremony as valid for either purpose? And, what is more important, are the Christian churches to be given power to traverse beyond their communal limits and strike at Hindu nationals without giving reciprocal rights to the Hindu community? One-sided capitulations forced upon disorganised and feeble nations are bad enough in world politics. In inter-communal affairs of a semi-religious character within the same State they produce deep antagonisms which are inimical to Indian unity and fellow-feeling.

It would be presumptuous of course to hope that our arguments will have the good fortune to carry conviction immediately to those who are firmly seated on vantage ground acquired by adverse possession long supported by the criminal courts of South India. We trust, however, it will be recognised by all that enough has been said on both sides of the question in these columns to disclose the existence of a sharp conflict of communal interest and sentiment in their matter. As Mr. Paul Appasami has noted in his handbook on Christian law (at page 72), these prosecutions under Section 68 "have always been unpopular and have tended to inflame feeling." This fact is sufficient to justify and strengthen our plea for a thorough inquiry by an impartial body of responsible public workers. We trust that the "Servants of the Untouchables Society", which is the chief All India organisation actively in the field at present, will move in the matter and appoint a committee of inquiry without delay, representative if possible of all persons and organisations interested in the welfare and freedom of the depressed classes, to gather information, consider all points of view, effect reconciliation where that is possible and suggest remedies where mutual adjustment is found impossible.

Until such a committee comes into being and has had time to study the question and make its recommendations, may we make an appeal to the National Christian Council of India to be so kind and accommodating as to arrange with its constituent churches to suspend altogether the policy of prosecuting Hindus under Section 68; or at least appoint conciliation boards, including representatives of the "Untouchable" and other welfare organisations, to examine every case of alleged breach as it arises before complaint is made to the Police? K. R.

Indian Labour in Ceylon:—The Department of Labour has issued statistics relating to immigration of Indian estate labourers in 1933. Last year immigrant labourers totalled 82,898, showing a decrease of 17,971 compared with the 1932 figures. The decrease of immigrant labour last year however is only slightly less than the decrease in the previous year. The number of emigrants totalled 88,959 of whom 42,883 were repatriates. The recruiting licences issued in 1933 totalled 1,802, compared with 2,587 last year, and 14,287 in 1930.

A GREAT INDIAN CHRISTIAN. (BY CYRIL MODAK.)

"Ich dien" is a motto which does not belong to the ostrich feathers of the Prince of Wales alone. Princely lives everywhere have the same motto on their unknown crests. In the noble confraternity of such as live to serve, Edmund Manoharao Modak, late Headmaster of the Mission High School, Jubbulpore, has a place all his own. His life knew but one refrain—"I serve!" His service was a glad hymn of praise. He sought no reward. He poured forth his life ministering to the intellectual, moral, and spiritual needs of students and fellow-citizens for a period of thirty-two years, beginning from the time that he started his career as a teacher in a 'night school' in Bombay a few months after graduating from Bishop's College, Calcutta, at the comparatively early age of twenty-two. At a recent Memorial Meeting of the Managing Committee of the Mission High School, a Hindu colleague said, "The text 'Make you His service your delight, Your wants shall be His care' did not only hang on a wall in Mr. Modak's home but was indelibly engraved on his heart."

In 1901 Mr. E. M. Modak took his first regular appointment at Midnapore as Headmaster of the Local Mission High School. After three years he went to Lucknow as Headmaster of the Wesleyan High School, where from 150 the total enrolment rose to about 400 in the four years of his stay. In 1908 he came to Jubbulpore in charge of the C. M. S. High School. In eight years not only had the numerical strength of the institution increased from about 200 to over 500, but in sports as well as in scholastic record the C. M. S. High School became the envy of the other five high schools in the city. But these were only years of preparation. For, although his school, whether in Midnapore, or Lucknow, or Jubbulpore, soon earned a reputation for strict discipline, high scholastic and moral standards, and an excellent spirit of sportsmanship, it is not for carrying on, however ably, schools which were already established but rather for reviving schools which had celebrated their euthanasia, that Mr. Modak will be better remembered.

It was in 1922, when his health was impaired by rough and dreary travelling on behalf of the National Missionary Society, that he was invited to build up the Harichand High School on the ruins of the Wesleyan High School of Lucknow. With characteristic enthusiasm he responded. In two years the Harichand High School was thriving, and the same year Mr. Modak was asked by the Secretary of the Church Missionary Society at Jubbulpore to revive their school which had closed in 1922. With just four boys he started the school. For five years he laboured unceasingly. In 1929 to his joy it became a recognized high school with a total enrolment of some 250 boys. In the same year the C. M. S. joined the Union, and a Union Christian High School took over the institution of the C. M. S. The next year the Union abandoned the middle school section, and it fell to Mr. Modak's lot to make a fresh start and build up this school under the most discouraging financial conditions, with a constitution broken by strenuous work and many cares.

Not knowing how to shrink from the most arduous duties or the most exacting sacrifice he fell to work to start an institution at fifty-four. And so his stalwart colleagues toiled with him, until in 1933 the Mission High School, as this institution was named, started its Matriculation class with some 250 boys in the whole school. But it had been too much for him.

The struggle of the builder with a vision cost him his life. He died in harness, as was his wish, on the 13th of December 1938, cheerfully submitting to unostentatious martyrdom at the behest of duty.

He loved his boys. He loved his school. He loved his work. He was a born educator. He satisfied Pestalozzi's ideal of a teacher. His boys found him as strict as a martinet and as solicitous as a father. A headmaster's work is seldom rescued from a drab routine. The sneer with which men refer to the 'schoolmaster's mentality' is well known. But for Mr. Modak a schoolmaster's work was too creative to be dull. He took the same interest in his duties as headmaster that the artist takes in the plastic arts. Every day brought its meed of joy, now because he had discovered new talent, or because some boy had turned over a new leaf, or a colleague had made a difficult lesson interesting, or perhaps because the hockey team had played a clean game. He had poetry in his soul. He had the mind of a statesman. He was a teacher at heart. He could talk to his boys on brotherhood; draft a constitution for the managing committee; demonstrate the dignity of manual work by helping to carry furniture; teach English, Mathematics, History, Sanskrit; show his boys at fifty-seven years of age how to bowl or pull at tug of war; and win the confidence of some guardian, with equal felicity and effectiveness.

Mr. Modak was able to steer his schools through times of financial crisis or political upheaval. As a member of the Diocesan Educational Board or the Education Committee of the Jubbulpore District Church Council, he filled an important place. His clear thinking, his ample experience, his practical wisdom, and his far-sighted statesmanship made his counsels valuable. Men in authority in the department of education had learned to respect his sound judgment. But coupled with his sagacity was a high idealism. His intellectual attainments found their complement in his sterling character.

Unless a teacher can live triumphantly, overcoming difficulties and grappling with adverse circumstances he cannot prepare his students for the strenuous business of living which after all is the purpose of education. Mr. Modak's life was one of unrelenting struggle and toil, but it was a victorious life. A splendid faith in the rationality of the universe and in the sovereignty of the Divine Will inspired him with the courage and the confidence necessary for constructive enterprises in any field.

Mr. Modak's victorious spirit was contagious. Teachers were always willing to rally round his standard, strive as hard as he did and bravely. He was never daunted by the most impossible tasks. He was always ready to undertake the work which others judged to be hopeless. His maxim was: What thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might. He knew nothing of the 'golden mean' of humanism. He worked intensely. He played intensely. He lived intensely. It was not possible for his staff or students to come into contact with him and not catch some of his fervent enthusiasm. How else could he have rebuilt three schools within the brief period of eleven years? For him a teacher without enthusiasm was like salt that had lost its savour.

A confirmed idealist in philosophical outlook, as an Indian might well be, he preferred Mission employment with all its handicaps to the more lucrative and attractive Government service because he thought he could thus once and for all take the path of sacrificial ministry. Personal considerations had no place in his decisions. Position, emolument, prestige, in short what the world calls success, had no attraction for him. Nothing satisfied him more, nothing gave him more joy than to spend himself unsparingly for the cause he had espoused.

Of hard work he was never afraid. His transparent sincerity urged his students and colleges to greater effort and won many friends for the institutions which he made. He understood the good life as a life unconditionally devoted to duty; and his passion for the good life gave him the energy to do what one with his shattered constitution should never have dared. His heroic idealism is not only remembered by his old students, but is a cherished source of inspiration to many of them, regardless of caste or creed.

Indeed, he loathed communal and partizan distinctions. He loved his motherland and endeavoured to serve her by training the youth that went through his schools to be worthy citizens, recognizing the dignity of personality. What is usually called the "Poor Fund" was called in his schools the "Brotherhood Fund" to which the students contributed so as to help their poorer brothers. The school songs voiced the sentiment of brotherhood and equality. Hindus, Muslims, and Christians worked together on his staff in harmony and with good will.

Whether in Midnapore or Lucknow or Jubbulpore he was trusted, for people knew he would do the right thing, engage the right man, without being swayed by communal or party feelings, even if he had to fall foul of the managing committees of his schools. Independence of thought made him a nationalist and tempered his nationalism. He was not anti-British but pro-Indian as a genuine Indian nationalist is bound to be. His students learned to love and honour their country and its leaders. The Assembly Hall of the Mission High School was adorned with the pictures of great Indians. In truth, many non-Christians, used to the old order of things, were agreeably relieved to find that Mr. Modak's Christianity did not dilute but refined his patriotic sentiments.

The life of this Christian patriot was packed with activity. He was a proficient teacher, a successful headmaster, a valued member of various educational boards. His presence in the school ensured good discipline. His voice on the playground inspired chivalry. Year after year the impact of his life upon the lives of students developed in them those qualities which stand one in good stead under the stress of testing periods. Month after month he instilled into young men a love for truth and a desire for knowledge, teaching courtesy and integrity by practice more than by precept. Day in and day out for well over a quarter of a century he imprinted upon the minds of boys that 'not failure but low aim is crime.' Did he promote the cause of Christian education? He wished he might. He aspired, toiled, suffered, dared.

Mr. E. M. Modak was a lover of truth, a lover of duty, a lover of all that has the power to make men nobler. To him was given the rare capacity of being a true educator. The best tribute to his life comes from those who acknowledge that they owe their success in life to his influence and efficient headmastership; and of such, happily, there are not a few.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Jan. 13]

THE NUDE IN ART AND LITERATURE

The Editor,
Indian Social Reformer,

Sir,

I could think of approaching only your weekly, when I felt, on reading an article on 'The Nude in Indian Art' in the July-August 1933 issue of the 'Triveni' by Prof. M. K. Chakravarti, M. A., B. L., that the learned professor's appeal to women in India deserves a wider circulation than is commanded by such a bi-monthly as the 'Triveni' which has—to quote the words of Rt. Hon. Srinivasa Sastri—'its appeal to a highly cultivated select few.' Hence the solicitude of the present writer for giving wider publication to the appeal through your esteemed and widely-read weekly. Concluding the article, which, by the way, is worth reading as a whole, the learned professor has sounded a note of warning to the so-called votaries of Art against debasing art and Literature by 'exploiting the nude and the semi-nude for commercial or so-called cultural purposes.'

In view of the fact that the market is being flooded with the mushroom growths of innumerable periodicals which seek to command a wider sale by publishing obscene literature under the name of Realism, as also by presenting pictures of semi-nude females, often of a low character, under the cloak of a desire to pursue 'Art for Art's sake' while, in fact pandering to the public taste of gratifying 'the carnal desires of the heart', women in India would do well to raise their voice of protest against the evil as is suggested by the professor in his appeal. He says: 'A word to the women of India. Let the rising generation of women in this country assert their self-respect by demanding a complete abolition of the type of Art which flourishes by exploiting the nude or the semi-nude for commercial, or so-called cultural purposes. Let our ladies make this a matter of 'Satyagraha' if necessary, and begin with the art-schools and art-studies of this country, and then tackle the theatres and cinemas. I am confident that they will ultimately succeed in purifying the art and literature of the country of the ugly realistic tendency which is growing apace. The pornographic fiction that is selling like hot-cakes in these days is a portent as ominous for the morals of the world as the increasing armament of the nations is for its physical existence.'

Will the women of India rise to the occasion, and stand up for their rights?

Bombay,
January 6, 1934.

Yours etc.,

G. H. J.

Bengal Hindus Condemn Communal Award:—"The fate of this fair province of Bengal is hanging in the balance and by the end of January the Joint Parliamentary Committee will have made its report. Any one who is not blinded by the communal jealousies or personal loyalties must be satisfied by this time that the communal decision of the Premier and the Poona Pact taken together, unless modified, will inevitably reduce caste Hindus in Bengal to a position of absolute political impotence. It is thus time that a united protest be made by all sections of the Hindu community of Bengal before it becomes too late," thus runs a manifesto issued through the "United Press". The manifesto is signed among others by Mr. Ramananda Chatterjee, Mr. Hirenranath Dutt, President of the Bengal Provincial Hindu Sabha, Mr. B. C. Chatterjee, the Hindu Maha Sabha delegate who gave evidence before the Joint Committee, Dr. Radhakumud Mookherjee and Mr. N. K. Basu.

PROHIBITION IN THE UNITED STATES.

(BY GUY HAYLER.)

The Press has said that there is now no Prohibition in the United States, supporting such an assertion by leading articles and special contributions written, for the most part, by people who have more of a flair for fireworks than any genius for facts. I would break yet another lance with these enthusiasts who now find that what they have "buried" refuses to lie down!

It is true that the American President has, for revenue purposes, done his best to end what his predecessor, Mr. Hoover, rightly called, in its simple rendering, "a noble experiment." The good work of one man cannot, with impunity, be undone by the bad work of another. President Roosevelt may live to regret his association with this turn-back on the Constitution. If politicians choose to hitch their wagons to fallen stars—and let it be understood that the star of liquorism in the United States waned and fell fourteen years ago never to be in the ascendant again—there must be no surprise when disillusionment comes, as it surely will. Not all is gold that glitters, and rum money is ruinous coinage.

It is too early yet to get the actual figures of the elections, especially as a number of States have for various reasons taken no vote on the issue, but when the world is told that America has been longing to get rid of National Prohibition, the available facts cannot be cited as supporting evidence. Neither the President nor his colleagues can congratulate themselves on the "verdict" of the country. America has no more decided to go Wet than has Britain decided to go Dry. Can thirty per cent of the total electorate be said to be the voice of America? Such figures as I have go to show that after the first twenty-nine States had voted it was found that only 23.3 per cent of the total electorate went to the polls! The Repeal of National Prohibition has been brought about not by the votes of the many but by the ballot of the few, several of whom have never seen a saloon or know what is meant by the term Liquor Traffic. So, America's money administrators, with the help of their racketeering agents, now, doubtless, "respectable" licensees, take in the Wet shekels with which to balance the Budget! The Hon. Gifford Pinchot, Governor of Pennsylvania, was right when he said recently, "It is utterly ridiculous to suppose that we can drink ourselves out of the depression back into prosperity. To spend a billion or two dollars a year for that which decreases human efficiency and lessens human working power can never be anything but a gigantic loss. Strong drink is an economic mistake."

It should be remembered that even with the 18th Amendment repealed, two-thirds of the States remain under the liquor ban which can only be altered through State Legislation. A fair-minded Press would have told the world that fact. When the States have spoken for themselves, then will it be time for the Wets to know what America is thinking about Prohibition. An American citizenry, especially the younger end of it, is about to find out that booze never leads to business recovery. The battle is on! As the Editor of "Twentieth Century Progress" (Washington, D. C.) says:

"We have not lowered our flag; we still advocate Prohibition as the most effective plan for dealing with the liquor problem."

SOCIAL LEGISLATION IN BARODA

Concluding his note on "Recent Legislation in Baroda, Mr. V. K. Durandhar, Legal Remembrancer, writes :

Mention also be made of an important change which has been made in the Hindu law of marriage prevalent in the State. The degrees of consanguinity within which marriage is prohibited among Hindus are reduced, after considering the opinions of medical men and other experts who have made a study of Eugenics. The prohibition is now confined to descendants and ascendants up to three degrees. The prohibition relating to marriage within the same Gotra is removed subject to the aforesaid prohibited degrees, thus widening the field for the choice of brides and bridegrooms.

Another legislation of great importance is the Sanyas Diksha Restraint Act which came into force on November 11, 1933. The Act forbids the initiation into Sanyas of, or giving Diksha to, a minor—a person under eighteen years of age. The initiation of or giving Diksha to a minor is declared void and having no effect on his legal rights and responsibilities. Such initiation is moreover made punishable with imprisonment upto one year and fine upto Rs. 500. It is hoped the general public will welcome the measure as its chief aim is to protect the interests of minor persons.

One more piece of social legislation has been recently sanctioned by his Highness the Maharaja Saheb. It is a well known fact that in Gujarat marriages are restricted to certain circles called Gols within the castes or sub-castes. This was found to be hampering the healthy growth of the society. His Highness the Maharaja Saheb, therefore, appointed a committee to examine the extent of this evil and suggest remedies. An Act called the Caste Tyranny Removal Act is passed based on the recommendations of that committee. Certain customs enumerated in the Act are styled "tyrannous customs" and it is provided that no caste shall ex-communicate or otherwise punish a member of the caste for a breach of such "tyrannous custom". If a person is so punished, he will be at liberty to prosecute the leader or the headman of the caste; the penalty prescribed in the Act is simple imprisonment not exceeding six months or fine not exceeding Rs. 1000 or to both. The Act came into force on 14th December 1933.

Nothing In A Name:—The name of "Lord Willingdon Island" is to be given to the new island formed by the reclamation works which are being carried out in connection with the construction of a new first-class port at Cochin, some 580 miles south of Bombay, says a message from Ernakulam, Cochin State. It matters not what name the new island is given, writes the Commonwealth, so long as it is not taken to mean that Lord Willingdon "owns" the land there. The inhabitants of the Sussex village of Willingdon, near Eastbourne, now pay some £ 10,000 a year to Lord W. for allowing them to live in the pleasant part of their native land.

Did Juliet Ever Exist?—The historians of Verona have decided that all the romance about Romeo and Juliet is mere tradition. The Capulets, it appears, never lived in that city: Juliet never existed. Local tradition was responsible for the story of the unfortunate attachment, but William Shakespeare wove it into an immortal play, for which everybody will be grateful. The tablet on the wall of the so-called house of Juliet is to be replaced by another, which will explain that local tradition, and not the historians, sanctioned the legend and inspired the greatest of poets. In short, the guides can no longer say, pointing to the famous balcony, "Here Juliet stood," but "Here, tradition says, Juliet lived, but it is not true."

INDIAN NATIONAL SOCIAL CONFERENCE.*

The reading of the Presidential address over, the Conference proceeded to deal with the resolution under the presidency of Mr. G. K. Devadhar:

The first resolution was on welfare work, social programme and study of social science. The resolution was as follows and the Lord Bishop of Madras moved the first part :

This Conference desires to place on record its appreciation of the labours in the cause of national service of the various welfare work institutions throughout the country. While welcoming the rapid growth in the number of such institutions including those devoted to rural reconstruction, this Conference is of opinion that their endeavour for national uplift needs and deserves to be amply supplemented by State aid either through legislative action or through financial assistance or through both. (2) This Conference is of opinion that the time has arrived for the formulation of social programmes including those relating to housing and health and for training and utilising the growing enthusiasm of the country for constructive work in the various departments of national life; and (3) This Conference is of opinion that the study of Social Science with special reference to Indian conditions should be actively promoted by the Universities in the country.

Dr. P. Varadarajulu Naidu moved: This Conference is of opinion that whatever justification there might have been in the past for the practice of untouchability and unapproachability, such justification has ceased to exist for a long time, and that its continuance works great social injustice at present. It, therefore, exhorts all caste Hindus to remove all obstacles to the legitimate self-expression of those suffering from such disabilities in all departments of life and to see that no non caste-Hindu suffers any disability by reason only of his birth; and (2) This Conference approves of the principle of the Temple-Entry Bill now before the Legislative Assembly, and requests the members thereof and the Government to pass it with suitable modifications to meet all legitimate criticisms as to the qualifications of the voters prescribed by the Bill.

Mr. S. Ramanaidhan moved that the resolution be rejected. He said that it was altogether reactionary. Without fighting the question of caste they could not solve the problem of untouchability. If they were going to be true social reformers they must totally reject the resolution and pass a separate resolution for the abolition of Varnashrama Dharma as unscientific and unsound.

Mr. O. C. Srinivasan proposed an amendment to modify the resolution as follows:—This Conference is of opinion that untouchability should be statutorily abolished making it penal, punishable by imprisonment; and (2) This Conference strongly approves the Temple Entry Bill now before the Legislative Assembly and requests the members thereof and the Government to pass it.

The President intervening asked members to realise that it was a Conference and not a bazaar and it was disgraceful to cause scenes like that. If any member had any opposition to make he was at liberty to approach him and mention the matter to him. The proceedings of the Conference should not be interrupted.

Mr. C. D. Nayagam at this stage proposed another amendment to Part I of the resolution and it read as follows :

" This Conference is of opinion that the problem of untouchability and unapproachability worked as a great social injustice and is a blot on humanity and therefore urges on all interested in the uplift of the country to take steps for the removal of all obstacles in all departments of life and see that no one suffered by reason of his birth."

Mr. C. D. Nayagam's amendment was put to the vote and carried.

Mr. O. C. Srinivasan's amendment was lost.

The original resolution as amended by Mr. Nayagam was then carried.

The resolution on the subject of "Women's Rights" referred to property, purdah and domestic science and was worded as follows:

"This Conference approves of the recent legislative attempts to extend the rights of Hindu Women in property and is of opinion that while the small changes till now advocated are beneficial to the extent to which they go, there is urgent need for a comprehensive survey of the whole question. It therefore requests the Government to appoint a Committee, one third of whose members shall be women, to investigate and report on the changes required to give women a legitimate share in joint family property and in the separate property of their husbands. (b) This Conference is of opinion that the custom of Purdah leads to serious injury to the health and intellectual advancement of women and exhorts the public to take all possible steps to alter it; and (c) This Conference views with satisfaction the great advance that has been made in the matter of higher education of women, and requests the Government and the public to arrange for the establishment in each Presidency of at least one college on the model of Lady Irwin College, recently established at Delhi, so that women's education may be of more practical use than it is at present."

How it came to be eliminated, there was no good of discussing now. The legislation such as that aimed at in the resolution existed in the states of Mysore and Baroda. It was possible that such legislation could also be framed in their country. Therefore it was that they wanted a committee to be appointed to investigate the question, examine witnesses and formulate a report.

Mr. M. D. Altekar (Bombay) then moved:—

This Conference while feeling grateful to the Government for the passing of the Child Marriage Restraint Act is of opinion that more effective steps should be taken than at present to enforce its provisions. It is further of opinion that the provision for a deposit by the complainant should be deleted, and that the penal provisions of the Act should be more rigorously enforced. (b) This Conference is of opinion that the age of consent outside marriage should be raised and taken up to 18 years. (c) This Conference deprecates the continuance of Kanya-Sulkam and Vara-dakshina and the high and ruinous expenses connected with marriage celebrations. It calls upon all to simplify the marriage ceremonies so that the celebration of marriages may be felt to be less of a burden than it is at present. It welcomes the law promulgated in some of the Native States to put down this evil. (d) This Conference is of opinion that unequal marriages between old men and young girls should be prevented by suitable legislation; and (e) This Conference while viewing with satisfaction the diminution of opposition to widow re-marriage is of opinion that the present law depriving the widow of the property inherited from her former husband, on her re-marriage, works great hardship in several cases where the second husband is not rich enough to provide for the re-married widow also, and that suitable amendments should be made in the Indian Widow Re-marriage Act to remedy this defect.

Mrs. Dadabhai moved that—This Conference approves of the legislation recently enacted to prohibit immoral traffic and is of opinion that its operation should be extended to the whole of British India. It calls upon the Government and the local bodies, to establish homes where girls that have to be dealt under the Act can be trained to become normal citizens of the State.

Mr. Andrews Dube (Lucknow) moved a resolution on temperance and it was duly seconded by Mr. S. Narayana Iyer and carried. The resolution was as follows:—

This Conference views with regret the setback which the movement for total abstinence from drink has received by the abolition of prohibition in the United States of America and by the reported failure of local opinion in certain parts of the Madras Presidency. (b) This Conference requests the Government to appoint a committee to investigate and recommend measures to eradicate altogether the evil of drink; and (c) This Conference calls upon the public to take vigorous measures to put down the drink evil, through propaganda, organisation of counter attractions, social boycott of those addicted to drink, closing of the facilities now provided in some clubs and similar institutions for getting drink, and the prohibition of the supply of alcoholic drink in all functions arranged with public subscriptions.

Mr. O. C. Srinivasan moved the following resolution:—

(a) This Conference notes with great regret the prevalence of poverty and unemployment throughout the country and is of opinion that the situation is one which calls for immediate remedial measures; (b) this Conference desires to draw the attention of the Government and of the public to the need for the extension of vocational education closely related to the industrial needs and possibilities of the country; and (c) this Conference while appreciating the action of the Government in carrying out some of the recommendations of the Whitley Commission, emphasises the need for early action through legislation and otherwise for carrying out all its recommendations.

Mr. T. Sundara Rao Naidu proposed and Rao Bahadur Krishna Rao Bhonsle seconded and it was duly carried that—(a) This Conference heartily supports the recent action of the Madras Government to prevent the practice of hook-swinging and hook-dragging in certain festivals in South India and requests the Government to rigorously enforce their order passed in 1894 prohibiting them; and (b) this Conference is of opinion that the public exhibition of similar practices of self-torture during popular festivals should be sternly prohibited and calls upon the public to discourage the resort to self-torture under any conditions.

Mr. C. D. Nayagam moved that this Conference while it appreciates the recent changes which have made marriages between members of different castes legally valid is of opinion that the time is come for the enactment of a purely Civil Marriage Act.

The Hon. Mr. Justice Ramesan moved the resolution on Birth Control Clinics—"Having regard to the prevalence even now of early marriages and the consequent early motherhood and frequent pregnancies, and the resultant deplorable deterioration in the health of young mothers, this conference approves of the proposal to open birth control clinics under the charge of competent medical authorities to give advice in proper cases."

In doing so, he said that it was essentially a subject which concerned ladies who were not present in large numbers. That did not however prevent him from saying that this subject was a matter of controversary. No country in the world could afford to have a large birth-rate. Over-production always ended in wastage of life. The problem was, could a woman go on giving birth to children until she became a complete wreck. Birth Control was not opposed to the tenets of Hinduism. Their ancestors in India were the first to preach birth-control and to lay down methods for it.

The resolution was duly seconded and carried.

The following resolutions were put from the Chair after a brief explanation and duly carried:—

(1) Divorce Bill:—This Conference is of opinion that in the present circumstances of the Hindu society the total absence of the right of divorce works great hardship on Hindu women. It approves of the principle of Sir Hari Singh Gour's Bill now before the Legislative Assembly and requests the Government and the members of the Assembly to enlarge its scope and pass an enactment providing for divorce in all cases in which divorce is allowed under the Indian Divorce Act and also in case where a Hindu husband marries another wife without the petitioning wife's consent.

(2) This Conference urges upon the Government the desirability of enlarging the scope of the Children Act and of widely enforcing the Children Act in the several provinces and calls upon the public actively to co-operate with the Government in the carrying out of its provisions.

The last resolution that was taken up for consideration was that relating to the abolition of caste and the resolution as drafted by the Reception Committee was in the following terms:—“This Conference deprecates the continuance even at the present time of the rigidity of the system of caste by birth. While noting with satisfaction the changed outlook that has come over the country on this question it views with regret the growth of class consciousness. It notes with regret the increasing tendency to lay emphasis on the membership of specific social and religious groups and to claim special privileges based on such membership. This conference exhorts the public to repel such claims and to work for national solidarity by affording equal opportunities for all.”

At first there was difficulty to find any to move the resolution, the attendance had by this time completely thinned and the President put it from the chair and it was carried.

On the proposition of Rao Bahadur R. Krishna Rao Bhonsle, a Committee was appointed to draft the constitution of the Indian Social Conference.

With a few remarks by the President, Mr. Devadhar, the Conference was dissolved.

Gandhi Plaque Removed From London Church—A plaque of Mr. Gandhi has been removed from Finchley Parish Church, London, following a storm of criticism during which the rector, the Rev. Stewart Bernays received letters of protest from all parts of the country. In place of Mr. Gandhi there now rests a plaque which Mr. Bernays described as representing a Flanders Poppy. The rector told the Evening Standard: The rebus of Gandhi was one of 15 designed by the architect of the £ 7,000 church extension, Sir Charles Nicholson, to represent the signs of the times. They are all on the ceiling of the new south aisle. They represent crises in the history of nations. There is the Russian bear representing the Soviet Union; a shillelagh, representing Ireland; a Tudor rose; and Mr. Gandhi. And last, but not least, there is one of the verger, with a broom and key and his initials. When the Gandhi design was first announced I received letters from all parts of the country, as well as from parishioners. Finally the parochial council and I decided that it would be wise, in view of public opinion, to take down Mr. Gandhi. We have done so.”

THE ECONOMICS OF BIRTH-CONTROL.

A number of interesting and thought-provoking papers were read and discussed at the Indian Economic Conference which held its session recently. As many as seven papers were read on the subject of population only and considerable interest was evinced during a lively discussion which ensued.

In a paper by Dr. Radha Kamal Mukherjee it was shown that a close correspondence between the rates of reproduction and mortality and the fluctuations of the cropped area existed at least in two districts in the United Provinces which he has investigated.

Mr. Jaffar Hasan of Osmania University in his paper stressed the importance of viewing the problem of population both from absolute and relative points of view. His conclusion was that, while from the absolute point of view India was not overpopulated, it was certainly so when the relative viewpoint was taken. The writer suggested that the remedy lay in restriction by birth-control and sterilization of the unfit.

In a paper on the strictly theoretical aspect of the problem, Mr. Zacharias of the Annamalai University dwelt on the relation existing between unemployment and growth of population.

The paper of Mr. S. Subramanian on Mathematical Economics showed what maximum of population could exist in the Presidency of Madras and in the State of Mysore, under certain hypothetical conditions.

Mr. H. Ghosh of the Calcutta University showed, in his paper the correlation between agricultural production, and the stability of population, and he maintained that no relation whatever existed between the two.

The paper of Mr. Joshi, research student of the Allahabad University, was an attempt to show that there existed close inter-relationship between birth rates and death-rates, prices and rainfall.

The discussion was particularly enlivening and more than one speaker maintained that the problem was not a merely economic one, it affected the ethical, the religious and communal sentiments of the people. Prof. Kale said that as economists they must take a neutral attitude towards the question of birth-control and that the best remedy either for checking the growth of population or for increasing the production of the country lay in educating the masses.

Prof. Madhava of the Mysore University dealt at length with the mathematical aspect of the problem and said that 15 years' experiment in the control of birth rate in the West had not reduced the growth of the population to any appreciable extent.

Prof. Vakil, of Bombay University began by saying that there existed a serious disequilibrium in the economic balance with regard to population and food supply in India for the past 70 or 80 years. He said that the problem could be solved either by restricting the population or by increasing productivity. Personally, he was not for any sort of compulsory birth control but at the same time would desire for the spread of education so that people might use their own discretion in using artificial methods of birth control.

In the afternoon the discussion became more and more enlivening. Dr. P. J. Thomas gave a new turn to the discussion by stressing the necessity of a statistical study on the subject of population. Indeed large numbers in this country were under-fed but there was statistical evidence to show that the population had not outrun production in this country.

Prof. Vakil had said that in the last 50 years of which they had census statistics a disequilibrium had arisen between the population and food supply, but the statistical evidence pointed otherwise. During the last 50 years the population in this country had increased by 89 per cent and during the last 80 years by about 20 per cent. During the same 80 years the production had increased more than 50 per cent and in the case of commercial crops the increase had been much larger. Yet, there was still poverty in the land and the standard of living was too low. Overpopulation may be to-day less than what it was 80 years ago but India might still be overpopulated. The causes of overpopulation were chiefly under-production, mal-distribution and the discarding of the true Indian ideals in regard to marriage, like "Brahmacharya," etc. On the one hand income and standard of living must be raised and on the other the growth of population must be checked, by late marriages and increased emigration. Thus India might attain an optimum level of population without resorting to devices of birth control.

Mrs. Alamelumangathayar Ammal, M.L.C., addressed the audience in Tamil. She said that the problem of population with its concomitant of birth control could not be solved by the deliberations of an assembly of males, but as mothers, women must be given a larger voice in any future legislative measure on the question.

Dr. Jain in a brief speech pointed out that any comprehensive treatment of the subject must take into account the quality of population and not merely the quantity. It is after all by the number of cultured people that the true economic condition of a nation is gauged.

Miss Overkehr of Trivandrum said that the question was moral rather than economic and that artificial methods of birth control should be stoutly opposed.

After a good deal of discussion by various other speakers the president summarised the different views expressed and concluded that the population had a tendency to adjust itself and that we need not really worry about it.

What India Means to England:—Lord Lloyd, speaking at an India Defence League Meeting, over which Lord Hereford, president of the local branch presided at Hereford, said, he could claim without fear of challenge that there had been up to date no single body of organised political opinion in India which had accepted or said a word in favour of the White Paper. The Indian controversy was a vital matter, because it touched our national honour and because India was of vital strategical importance. If we abandoned our rule or power in India, it would be impossible to maintain the standard of living we had been accustomed to in England, and our country would be stricken by overwhelming poverty, because, during the last 200 years a very large proportion of our wealth had directly or indirectly come from India.

Prince by Deed Poll:—London, writes a correspondent of the People of Lahore, has been amused by an announcement in the Press that the son of Lt. Col. Warliker has changed his name by deed poll, embodying the title of "Prince". "The 'Prince' is 41 years of age and is the son of the late Colonel by his first wife. He has spent a lot of time in America, where no doubt he will find his new made title a remunerative asset. Colonel Warliker, who died last year, was a prominent member of the Indian community in London. His second wife, an English-woman, could throw no light on the reasons of the son's change of name. By his second marriage, the Colonel had three daughters, one of whom obtained her Air Pilot's certificate at a very early age."

THE NEED FOR BIRTH CONTROL IN INDIA.

The Director, Birth Control International Centre, London, writes:—

The economic conditions of India condemn millions of its people to a state of permanent and inescapable poverty. This poverty has many causes but the most fundamental are the density of India's population and its defective agricultural organisation. Closely dependent upon these, too, are high rates of infant and maternal mortality and a generally low level of health. It may not be true to suggest that the population of India is too large for its potential natural resources, but that its existing resources cannot support a population which is expanding at the present rate is surely not a matter for dispute. The penalties for ignoring these facts are famine, a wretched standard of living and an appalling death rate.

Under the stress of modern industrial conditions India is realising an ever-growing and more urgent obligation to make fuller use of its economic resources. New needs are being discovered, hitherto unthought of amenities, and rapidly there is developing a demand for higher standards of living. The women of India, moreover, now grown politically conscious are becoming actively concerned with the needs of future generations: they are demanding better conditions for mothers and children.

The expansion of education and industry will break down many of the taboos which still hamper the development of the present generation of women. One result—as the experience of the more prosperous classes has made evident—will be a postponement of the marriage age. But to produce the fullest possible benefit this changing social custom must affect also those classes which always live on the verge of starvation. The alternative is a differential birth-rate greatly to the disadvantage of the peoples of India.

Western experience has shown the tragic waste that results from allowing nature to fix the limit of population. It has shown, too, that higher standards of living are correlated with a deepening sense of individual and social responsibility towards women and children. India is ready to profit by this experience. The Nationalist movement has awakened Indian women to the urgency of social problems in a way that was unthinkable twenty years ago. Conscious at last of their power, inspired by the sacrifices made by their fellow countrywomen, they will not consent to return to their former life of obscurity and illiteracy. They have come to realise how much the future of India depends upon their efforts.

All movements for the emancipation of women have brought with them a demand for more education and healthier motherhood. Already there is evidence of these developments in India. Economic life outside the home is becoming more frequent. The practice and ideals of birth control have permeated the educated classes and have had, according to Indian economists, a far more widely reaching effect than has been generally realised. India seems well abreast of other Eastern countries in its demand for scientific birth control knowledge.

This knowledge must be supplied at once. It will raise the standard of living; it will stem the present wastage of human life; and it will prevent the widespread resort to abortion with its danger to maternal life and health. Women in the West who have enjoyed the benefits of birth control in their own homes and have seen them in the homes of the poorer strata of society, feel that their feminism and humanity alike call upon them to bring similar benefits to their sisters in India. They feel responsible for placing at the disposal of Indian women the knowledge and experience they have been accumulated by the birth control movements in Europe and America.

As a first step a Conference was held in London in November to discuss with Indian and other Eastern men and women the desirability of organising a fuller Conference in India in 1934. Further more, it is hoped to send out to India, at an early date, a qualified nurse who will visit training institutions in the East and report on ways and means of establishing birth control work on a solid foundation both in the large towns and the up-country villages. Your help, the help of every Indian man and woman, is needed for the successful realisation of these ends. If you can co-operate in any way, you are invited to communicate with the Director, The Birth Control International Information Centre, Parliament Mansions, Westminster, S. W. 1., who will discuss with you the part that you personally can play.

Successor to Dalai Lama:—It is believed that when a Dalai Lama passes away only his body perishes among men and that his spirit merely translates itself into another body. Immediately, therefore, a Dalai Lama is found to be dead in body, all the other children born at the time when his spirit passes out are listed and in the manner prescribed a search is made among them for the one in whose little body the vanished spirit has made its new home. He having been discovered is duly and formally recognised as the new Dalai Lama and he is forthwith consigned to a monastery so that he may, in due course, be brought up in the right way and educated and prepared for the active assumption of the Dalai Lamaship when he comes of age. If in the course of the 18 or 20 years that must pass before he assumes his full mantle of responsibility he died, then the whole process is gone through again and the Dalai Lama in spirit and in fact is held again to have transferred himself to the body of a new babe. While the new chief of the State is growing up Tibet is governed under a system of regency. There appears some doubt concerning the part that the Tashi Lama plays in all these matters.

The Heretical Unitarians:—A first class ecclesiastical sensation was caused by Lord Hugh Cecil, demanding that action be taken against the Bishop of Liverpool (Dr. A. S. David) and the Dean of Liverpool (the Very Reverend F. W. Dwelly) regarding recent sermons preached at a Liverpool Cathedral by two Unitarians. Lord Cecil sent a memorial to the Bishop of Liverpool complaining against the Dean permitting two Unitarian ministers to preach in the cathedral. Lord Cecil also petitioned the Archbishop of York (Dr. Temple,) wherein he charges the Bishop of Liverpool in the following terms, "that being bound to banish and drive away all erroneous and strange doctrines contrary to God's word and both privately and openly to call upon and encourage others to do the same, he hath sanctioned and (or) permitted and (or) condoned and (or) approved and (or) neglected and failed to rebuke and forbid all or some of the offences against the laws ecclesiastical, within his diocese by the Very Reverend Frederick William Dwelly. Lord Cecil further says that the Bishop of Liverpool hath thus acted and failed to act, well knowing that each of the persons named in the memorial was commonly reputed to be Unitarian, that is to say, a person holding heretical opinions, inconsistent with the essential doctrines of the Church of England.—Router.

NOTES

Communalism, Good and Bad :—A much respected Muslim nationalist, Dr. Mahomed Alam of Lahore, in a communication to the press refers to an Anti-Communal League—it is not clear whether one is in existence or is yet to be started—to fight communalism and abolish it in all shapes and forms. Dr. Alam holds that religion should not be the basis of civic rights. If the object of the League is to work for the unification of the franchise, it will command the acceptance of a large circle of intelligent men and women. It is not really necessary to abolish communalism in all shape and form to secure this limited object. It is obviously not possible to do so, so long as there are in the world people professing different faiths and seeking to mould their lives according to their tenets and traditions. Further, communal movements are often a convenient means of effecting social reforms among communities. There is a type of mind which always runs to extremes. Because the Church has often stood in the way of progress, religion appears to it as the root cause of stagnation. Because capitalists in several countries have usurped the authority of the State, capitalism must be destroyed in order to have justice done to the masses. Likewise, because communalism in India has been made the basis of the franchise and become the cause of political strife, all communal movements are evil. There are signs of a reaction against communalism which is as unreasonable as the trend towards it. It is high time, therefore, that it is realised that there is a right sort of communalism and a wrong sort. The right sort of communalism seeks to promote the growth of one's community so that it does not lag behind and become a drag on national progress. The wrong sort is totally unmindful of the interests of the whole in its selfish and short-sighted eagerness to advance its own caste or group at the expense of others. There will be greater chances of establishing unity of national purpose if this distinction is recognised and efforts directed to keep communalism to its proper limits than if efforts were directed to attack and overthrow communal activities altogether.

Acetone and Palestine :—Reuter has not of late sent any news as regards the situation in Palestine. But the Free Press Journal published this week a cable from Jerusalem dated the 17th instant stating that Arab demonstrations against the Zionist policy took place in the chief cities of Palestine on that day, in strict accordance with the conditions prescribed by Government. Mr. Lloyd George in his "War Memories" tells the public how the Zionist policy came to be adopted by the British Government. When he was at the Ministry of Munitions, one of the problems he had to solve was to provide an adequate supply of acetone, an essential ingredient for making cordite. The American supply was not enough. Professor Weizmann undertook to invent a new method for producing acetone from maize and succeeded in doing so. What followed is stated thus by Mr. Lloyd George: "I said to him: 'You have rendered great service to the State and I should like to ask the Prime Minister to recommend you to His Majesty for some honour.' He said: 'There is nothing I want for myself.' 'But is there nothing we can do as recognition of your valuable assistance to the country?' I asked. He replied: 'Yes, I would like you to do something for my people.' He then explained his aspirations as to the repatriation of the Jews to the sacred land they had made famous. That was the fount and origin of the famous Declaration about the National Home for Jews in Palestine." (Vol. II, page 56.) By the way, Mr. Lloyd George mentions that he was enabled to test the efficacy of a new gun which the War Office had rejected, by a donation of £20,000 from an Indian Maharaja, whose name he does not give. Besides the chapter on the "Mesopotamian Muddle" this is about the only reference to India in the two volumes so far published. Mr. Lloyd George's book lacks the detachment of Mr. Winston Churchill's "World Crisis" and is virtually a defence of the several phases of his conduct as a member of the Asquith Cabinet, which had become the subject of criticism. Mr. Lloyd George is realpatidar unsparing in his judgment of most of his colleagues.

Unseasonable Propaganda:—The Hindustan Times publishes a report of a meeting of a Committee of the Lucknow University at which a member wanted to speak in Hindi. The Vice-Chancellor, Dr. Paranjpye, who was presiding, disallowed the departure from the established practice of proceedings at University meetings being conducted in the English language, whereupon the member left the meeting. The correspondent characterises the Vice-Chancellor's ruling as arbitrary, whereas it is the conduct of the member which deserves that epithet. The champion of linguistic provincialism has issued a manifesto declaring that he wanted to advance the cause of Hindustani as the lingua franca of India by speaking in that language at the committee meeting of the Lucknow University. This result may or may not follow from his action. But it was certainly discourteous to the Vice-Chancellor who has to regulate the proceedings, for a member to speak in a language which is not the official language of the University. That Dr. Paranjpye may not be sufficiently versed in Hindustani to follow a speech, is a minor issue. This is an instance of the cheap and narrow provincialism which passes for patriotism in some people nowadays.

Asia and Europe:—While Signor Mussolini at the Asiatic Students' Conference held in Rome expatiated on the importance of restoring the ancient cultural contact between Asia and Europe, a pan-Asiatic Conference in Tokio was discussing on the creation of a Concert of Asia against European cultural domination. European civilisation has during the last two centuries tended more and more to assume a predatory character. Every nation in Asia has suffered from the exploitation to which Signor Mussolini referred. There is a reaction against this as the result of the War. There is a distinct tendency in Europe to seek co-operation with Asia on an equal and friendly footing. This tendency is likely to grow. By all means we should strive to promote closer understanding between the nations of Asia. But this can be done without antagonism to Europe or America in so far as the latter do not by their actions provoke it. India by her history and genius is marked out as the mediator between the two continents; and her influence, when she is in a position to exert it freely, will certainly be cast on the side of a synthesis of Asiatic and European culture and civilisation.

"Bridge Parties":—This heading which the New Statesman and Leader gives to an article in its issue of December 30 on the estrangement between Indians and Englishmen in India, is borrowed from Mr. E.M. Foster who gave it to the functions intended to bridge the gulf between the two races. After narrating an incident the journal remarks that it is symptomatic of the growing exclusiveness of Indian society. It is not, however, the fact that Indian society is growing more exclusive. On the contrary the number of Indian homes in which Europeans are received as guests as a matter of course, have enormously increased in recent years. In the old days if a European was invited even to a tea-party, special arrangements often involving the complete dislocation of the household were made. Nowadays, however, such arrangements are not only not considered necessary but many European friends would be unhappy if they knew that their presence had upset the house. It is also partly due to the fact that many Indian homes have modified their arrangements. It must be said, however, that Englishmen are less accommodating in these matters, or at least are thought to be so, than Europeans and Americans. The political factor also comes in the way of perfectly equal relations. Most Indian homes which have liberalised themselves, are strongly devoted to nationalistic views and several of them include members who have suffered in one way or another for nationalist propaganda. The presence of English friends necessarily involves considerable reserve and restraint in the intercourse of the life of the family where they happen to be guests in order not to embarrass them. It is further remarkable as a proof of the growing liberality of Indian social and family life that the number of inter-marriages is rapidly increasing. Within the last few days we have known of at least four actual or prospective brides who have come to India from Europe. Really speaking, the gulf which used to exist between the European and Indian is being rapidly bridged not by the old sort of parties but by a growing appreciation of the common stock of essential ideas between East and West.

Indians in South Africa:—We publish this week a frank talk given by Lady Maharaj Singh to the members of the Overseas League on Indian women. The first two Agents to the Government of India were handicapped by the fact that they went to South Africa unaccompanied by their wives. The report which we print of Lady Maharaj Singh's speech shows that she addressed her audience with directness.

The Colonisation Scheme:—As we go to press, a cabled Reuter message from Durban announces that the Committee, appointed by the Government of South Africa to inquire into the possibilities of sending Indians, from India and South Africa, to colonise some other country, has concluded collecting evidence and is now engaged in drawing up its report. The message concludes that the prospects of any scheme evolving out of the findings of the Committee are remote as "a large section of the Indian community" was opposed to the inquiry. So far as we know, and the evidence of the agent Kunwar Maharaj Singh at Durban bears out this, all sections of the Indian community are opposed to any colonisation scheme.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, JANUARY 20, 1934.

THE EARTHQUAKE.

The great event of the week was the earthquake which was recorded by the instruments of the Bombay Observatory on Monday at 2-17 in the afternoon. The Bombay Sentinel that evening noted that there was an earthquake shock felt at about 2-15 P. M. by the residents of two buildings near Ballard Estate. They rushed out of the buildings with their children and shouted cries for help as they felt the buildings shaking and thought they would come down. The shock lasted only a few seconds. People who read this news thought little of it at the time. They went to bed without the least apprehension of the terrible happenings over a large part of the country. They were surprised to read in Tuesday's morning papers startling accounts of the earthquake in Delhi, Calcutta, Cawnpore, Patna and other places in Northern India. There was a severe shock lasting five minutes at Delhi where damage to buildings was reported. In Calcutta the Viceroy and Lady Willingdon were at the Sealdah Railway Station when the shock occurred and Her Excellency remarked "We left Madras in a cyclone and we leave Calcutta during an earthquake." The Chief Justice of the Calcutta High Court and two colleagues who were sitting as a Full Bench to hear an appeal in a murder case, retired to their chambers where they were no safer from a calamity of this type. Prisoners in the dock before the Chief Presidency Magistrate jumped out of the enclosure and tried to escape from custody. In Cawnpore hundreds of houses collapsed occurred. Patna suffered the worst. Several persons were killed and injured there as also in Gaya and many buildings public and private were seriously damaged. Lucknow also reported damage to buildings. The seismographs in Bombay and Calcutta were thrown out of order. Those in Britain recorded an almost unprecedented earthquake some 5000 miles away and Mr. Haw, leading seismologist, stated that the disturbance lasted one hour and actually rang his earthquake bell.

Later news from other places show that the effects of the earthquake were felt in Central and even Southern India and that the loss of life and property in Bihar where the shock was greatest was extensive. In one district of Bihar the deaths numbered a thousand and the town of Muzzafarpur was wrecked. When the earthquake came large fissures appeared in the ground and water spouted out from everywhere and spread itself. The whole district was five feet under water, reported two men who reconnoitered from an aeroplane. Railway tracks and bridges have been greatly damaged in some places. Telegraph and telephone wires have snapped and communication with the worst affected areas has been interrupted. The total of deaths in Bihar province, according to reports available, on Friday is 2500. The first official report regarding the havoc done by the earthquake in North Bihar states that the number of deaths so far recorded is 409.

Monghyr town has suffered very severely and the loss of life is estimated at several hundreds. The Bazar is reported to be in a heap of ruins. The Hospital has been destroyed as also many other buildings. Four hundred workers of the local tobacco factory had a miraculous escape when the tobacco factory suffered damage. Only one life was lost. In Jamalpur the loss of life is estimated at 20, but considerable damage has been done to property. No shortage of food is anticipated but difficulty may be experienced with regard to water supply in those places where wells have been destroyed. Parts of affected areas are pitted with circular geyserlike holes through which water and mud spouted. The surface of the land is also marked in places by cracks hundred or two hundred yards long with grey mud. Patches of flood water observed on Tuesday on lands which were previously dry are reported to be diminishing on Wednesday. The centre of the disturbance was located in Nepal territory. The Bombay meteorologist Dr. S. C. Roy told a press representative that it was not easy to forecast earthquakes. Hindu astrologers, however, had foretold that the position of the planets last Saturday indicated a great calamity in Northern India, and religious ceremonies to mitigate its effects were arranged and were being performed for the last several days, and clothes and food distributed to the poor at Multan and other towns. Some shocks were also reported on Tuesday.

ANOTHER COMMISSION.

One third of the twentieth century has run out and all the time India has been the subject of several Commissions and Committees of Enquiry. Lord Curzon set up Commissions to enquire into every Department. Then we had Commissions to probe our currency and exchange problems. Committees have sat to find out the facts about taxation education, marriage age. Two Royal Commissions devoted two years each to probe Indian Labour and Agricultural conditions. Many of the Reports of these Commissions and Committees, notably those for the reform of Government Departments such as Jails and the Police, have been only partially carried out or not at all—Now we are to have another enquiry by two British experts. Sir George Schuster, the Finance Member of the Government of India, made a speech the other day at the Royal Exchange in Calcutta, explaining the objects of the proposed Survey. He had, he said, three things in view in starting the Survey. First, to stand back and attempt to make a complete and thorough diagnosis of the present economic position. In the second place, the diagnosis having been made, it is important that records should be kept up, so that the Government and the representatives of the public in the legislatures or elsewhere, may be able to keep their finger on the economic pulse of the nation. In the third place, he added, it is of growing importance that the people of India themselves should study and understand their economic position in a scientific way. Several questions arise out of these reasons or objects. Have Government been hitherto working without any definite idea of the economic condition of the people? They have always professed to be perfectly informed of all conditions and to be guided by purely scientific considerations in all their taxation and economic schemes. There is an ancient saying that the wearer best knows where the shoe pinches. The people of India do not require an enquiry by two British experts to enable them to keep their fingers on their own economic pulses. The Whitley Commission made an exhaustive survey of Labour conditions and the Linlithgow Commission of Agricultural conditions. The two Commissions together covered practically the whole field of India economic life. Conditions have changed, it is true, since they made their reports. But they collected and set forth all the basic facts, and unless the Indian Government contemplates a constant succession of enquiries, in the two reports and other subsidiary ones, they have all the material needed to form a fairly accurate idea of the economic facts of India life. The present time when everything is unsettled and the public is greatly perturbed over its political future, is not the most suitable one for standing back and gazing at the panorama of Indian poverty. Apart from the fact that Sir George Schuster is himself about to vacate his office and will not be here to carry out his objects, the Government itself is on the eve of radical changes in its constitution.

SWAMI VIVEKANANDA.

(BY SWAMI SAMBANDHANANDA).

Seventyone years back, this sacred land of the East gave birth to Swami Vivekananda. His career though short was eventful. People of all sects and societies of the world at the time were more or less overwhelmed with religious doubts and disbeliefs. Sectarianism and fanaticism overtook the few that cared for religion. Dissension, prosecution and persecution were the cries of the day. All these gave rise to a knotty problem and to solve it there met a Parliament of Religions at Chicago. Here too the representatives of the different religions, far from evincing a spirit of tolerance and acceptance, were busy preparing to establish the superiority of each over the other. Vivekananda was the first to cut the gordian knot. He believed that he belonged as much to the universe as to India and the God of his religion was Truth—the essence of all creeds and isms on Earth. He declared that all forms from the lowest Fetichism to the highest Absolutism, had a place in Hinduism and each of the religions was as great and good as the other. This eloquent pronouncement was not without effect. It not only defined Hinduism anew but opened up a fresh vista for the development of harmonious international friendship and co-operation. His patriotism broke down the prison walls of nationalism and internationalism to merge itself into the ocean of universalism.

The Swami had a special and profound regard for the land of his nativity. Her great and glorious past, ancient culture and civilisation, her beauty, potentialities and realities made India an object of adoration to him. He calls him a true Indian who is conscious of her glorious past and hoary antiquity, feels himself at oneness with the millions, and makes their sufferings, joys and aspirations his own. A true Indian lays his life as a sacrifice at the altar of the welfare of his country. To regenerate India the great Swami was confronted with a number of problems and the most puzzling of them all was the elevation of the masses. Equality and Education he considered to be the two main factors for the achievement of this end. He held each and all responsible for the work and declared "so long as the millions live in hunger and ignorance, I hold every man a traitor who having been educated at their expense, pays not the least heed to them. I call these men—who strut about in their finery having got all their money by grinding the poor—wretches, so long as they do not do anything for those two hundred millions who are now no better than hungry savages! We are poor, my brothers, we are nobodies, but such have always been the instruments of the most High." He, therefore, calls him a Mahatman whose heart bleeds for the poor, otherwise he is a Duratman.

To carry through this great mission of his life, the Swami wanted a hundred thousand men and women, who "fired with the zeal of holiness, fortified with eternal faith in the Lord, and nerved to lion's courage by their sympathy for the poor, the fallen and the down trodden, should go over the length and breadth of the land, preaching the gospel of salvation, the gospel of social raising up—the gospel of equality." He believed the infallible power of the Vedic Mantras which declare,—“Each soul is potentially divine.” He did not believe in a religion or God which cannot feed the unfed, clothe the naked, teach the untaught and wake them up to the consciousness that they too are men and as good as anyone of the human race. He treated doctrines, dogmas and books or temples as the secondary details of religion.

Education, with Swami Vivekananda, meant man-making education. It does not consist in the infusion of a number of ideas into one's brain. Education, to him, is that which brings in selfconfidence, develops firm convictions, the mothers of great deeds shapes the angularities and builds up an ideal character. Education is that which is the manifestation of perfection already in man and makes a devil divine. He also knew that it was not the work of a day and the path was full of deadly thorns. But he had unshaken Faith in the help that came from within backed up by that of the Almighty Father. All that he wanted was "fiery faith and fiery sympathy." His resolute will and firm determination urged him to propose the worship of the Virat—the men and animals around them and the first God the people have to worship should be their own countrymen. "Where should you go to seek for God?" He exclaims, "Are not the poor, the sick, the miserable, the weak, Gods?"

"Renounce and serve" was the motto of the life of the great Swami Vivekananda. The spirit of renunciation and service finds most eloquent expression when he unburdens his innermost feelings saying,—“May I be born again and again and suffer thousand miseries so that I may worship the only God that exists, the only God I believe in, the sum total of all souls, and above all my God the miserable, my God, the poor of all races and of all species is the special object of my worship.”

realpatidar.com INDIA AND AMERICA. *

(BY DR. S. MUTHULAKSHMI REDDY.)

I am deeply touched by the kind hospitality of the American people. I find that American men and women are much interested in the present situation in India and evince sympathy for India's legitimate aspirations and above all they love and respect our great men and women like Tagore, Mrs. Naidu and Gandhiji.

The recent International Congress of Women held at Chicago organised by the National Council for Women of the United States was a unique success. Women delegates from about 80 countries in the world, both Occidental and Oriental, of whom I was one, discussed "Our Common Cause, Civilisation" and issued a declaration of international rights so as to provide security and opportunity for all, for every man, woman and child. This was a great work, a resolve on the part of the women of the world to do away with violence, war and injustice and establish true fellowship and love among races and countries. Similar to the memorable American Declaration of Independence of 1766, this was a declaration of international co-operation and love. Woman's influence both at home and in society is very profound and far-reaching. That is why the Hindus, both ancient and modern, worship the goddess rather than the god. When the thinking women of the world have adopted this resolution we can hope to see a better and happier world in the near future. The honour of assembling the women of the world to discuss the "Common Cause, Civilisation" and issuing such a wonderful declaration belongs to America and to that great country the whole world stands indebted.

Many books have been written about India and you all must have heard about the Hindu caste-system. You would be surprised to know that the Vedas and Upanishads, ancient Hindu scriptures, do not make any mention of a caste called the "Untouchables." Only four Hindu primary castes are recognised according to the calling or the occupation of the individuals. The famous Harbilas Sarda, the author of the Sarda Act, who is a Sanskrit scholar has stated in one of his works that in the same family and among the children of the same parents, these four different castes could be found classified according to their profession and there was no superiority or inferiority among themselves and he was not considered higher or lower on account of his particular calling. So it shows that the principles underlying caste in these days were quite different from the modern notions of caste. The so-called untouchables who are also called Adi-Dravidas were the original inhabitants of India. The Aryan invaders who were fair in complexion and more civilised made the conquered race to cultivate their lands and do them services. But there was no slavery as in the West. The Adi-Dravidas had their own houses, lands and they were quite independent except that they had to serve their landlords. As any other caste-Hindu they followed their customary avocations for centuries together, and they owned separate quarters as the coloured people in America. As they were less civilised and unclean they were not allowed to closely associate with the caste-Hindus and hence they became untouchables. Of course with the spread of the modern scientific education every class in India now realise the evils of the present-day rigid caste-system in Hindu society which is based upon birth and not upon any calling, certainly a degeneration of the original Vedic caste-system. It is not only the so-called untouchables but also others desire to get rid of the existing caste-system and hence it is fast breaking down and it is bound to disappear in the course of a few years. Intercaste marriages are taking place and especially the educated women contract alliances outside their own caste. Therefore the caste-system based upon one's birth alone is doomed to die an early death and the distinctions based upon one's social status and intellectual attainments will alone be recognised. The modern movement for the abolition of the caste-system was first started by the famous reformer Raja Rammohan Roy even 100 years before. But now the movement has touched the masses and Gandhiji with his big following has devoted himself to the task of eradicating not only untouchability from India, but also for doing away with all meaningless caste disabilities and distinctions.

The women's place in Hindu society, as I have already stated, was very high during the Vedic period when the Hindus had their own government, as there are records to show that there was perfect sex-equality. It was only during the warlike period of Indian history that her position became one of utter subordination and subjection and she was deprived of all her rights. But it must be said to the credit of India's men that her cause has found loyal and staunch advocates among men. Raja Rammohan Roy, the first and foremost reformer, had fought successfully for her rights and had secured the abolition of the cruel custom of "Sati" even 100 years before. Since that period many men-reformers had followed in his foot-steps and had been attempting to reform the Hindu Law so as to raise the women's position in society. I will mention only a few of such illustrious names. Pandit Vidyasagar of Bengal was responsible for widow re-marriage act, Sir Harisingh Gour for raising the age of consent for girls and Harbilas Sarda for the child-marriage restraint act. There have been many men-educationalists like Prof. Karve of the Indian Women's University and Mr. Devadhar of Seva-Sadan who have devoted themselves to the educational advancement of women. There have been many more who had donated liberally to widow's homes and Hindu women's home of service. I should not on this occasion fail to mention the name of a staunch friend of women, Mr. Natarajan, the editor of the Indian Social Reformer who is honouring us with his presence on this platform. He has been, since his advent into public life, advocating our cause ably and loyally. Therefore it was perfectly easy for us after the inauguration of the Montagu-Chelmsford reform of 1919 to secure equal franchise rights with men without any struggle on our part. What our western sisters took years of struggle and suffering to achieve, Indian women have been able to secure within a few years without any labour on their part. As the pioneer work has been done by the men-reformers before the advent of women into public life in the country Indian women have become legislators and members of the University; hundreds of women are serving as honorary magistrates, members of municipalities, local bodies and educational boards. There is no sex-rivalry or no sex-antagonism till now in India. In service married women are preferred to single women and women are actually welcomed by our men and encouraged to enter public life, so much so that within the last one or two decades it has been possible for the Indian women not only to develop innumerable local women's associations, but also to organise the All-India Conferences as well as to participate in the international conferences. Some of the men-reformers help and co-operate with women to advance the women's interest. Gandhiji is one of such good men and a staunch advocate for equal rights for women. That is why many women have joined his party and have gone through much suffering and sacrifice in the recent non-co-operation movement. He has been combining social reform with political. He has been preaching as much against the tyranny of social customs like child-marriage, purdah and Deva-dasi system as much as he is demanding self-government or Dominion Status for India, and many of us agree with his views that unless India has a national and fully responsible government, many of the reforms that India is in need of today will not be possible in the near future. British government has committed itself to the principle of religious neutrality and more often to our sorrow and disappointment side with the orthodox reactionary group than with the progressive and enlightened people of the country. If one studies the records of the government as well as the discussions in the assembly and the senate one will be convinced of the truth of my statement. The untouchability evil has been recognised by the British courts and is enforced with the help of the British government as you would see from the memorial presented to the Viceroy by the depressed class representatives.

Our education is very backward and our health record is the poorest in the world. We have to pay a salt-tax and the revenue from the drink is increasing with each year even though the great religions of India prohibit drinking, because the present government cannot manage without drink revenue. Fifty per cent of our revenue is spent upon the army and only five per cent on education. Most backward in education, with the lowest literacy figure in the world and the poorest health record how can India rest content under the present rule? Every reform is hampered for want of scientific knowledge and enlightenment. Among the people, except in a few cities, there is not yet a system of compulsory primary education and no proper medical inspection of schools. The whole thing works in a vicious circle. The Hindu society has been the subject of much criticism by foreign writers, but I appeal to the audience to study the above facts and then come to a conclusion. Before I finish I wish to give my impression of the American people. We in India have been under the impression that the Americans are materialistic-minded and they are only mindful of amassing wealth and enjoying themselves, because we have only heard of the American millionaires and we have read about the beautiful sky-scrapers, about your inventive genius, engineering skill, about your advance in science, medicine and surgery. But till we came to your country and saw you in your place ourselves we did not know that you also have among you good and spiritually-minded men and women who are moved by the same thoughts and ideals as the oriental philosophers and saints. We have found also that some of you are actuated by that love and nobleness which recognises greatness and goodness wherever it may be, irrespective of colour, race, creed or country.

Above all, as you are free and you enjoy the blessings of freedom you love and respect all those who suffer and sacrifice for freedom of thought and action. I shall convey to my people in India your most warm and cordial greetings and your good wishes for the success of our country's cause.

Sarda Act in Rewa:—His Highness the Maharaja of Rewa has given his assent to the Child Marriage Restraint Bill passed by the Raj Parishad (Legislative Council) in its last sessions. The Bill is modelled on the lines of the British Indian enactment, known as the Sarda Act, and penalises marriage of boys and girls below the age of 18 and 12, respectively. Further, a Bill for the abolition of the Talak and dowry is under the consideration of the Parishad.

RELIGIOUS UNDERSTANDING.

(By ARTHUR YOUNG)

Truth fails every time we try to measure the whole of it by any single one of its aspects. We, each of us, live and cognate in our own individual frame of reference. However much the present system of mass education may develop mass mentalities, our vocation, environment and peculiar circumstances must inevitably build up an individualistic understanding.

This understanding is the measure or maya we apply to all our appreciations. Einstein's theory of relativity is in a way, just as applicable in the realm of religious thought as it is in our scientific calculations. In the "Tibetan Book of the Dead" Prof. Evans Wentz describes a Priest reciting to the "Departed Spirit" the kind of gods and sights he will now encounter on his new journey; but, he completes the rite by warning the "soul" that he sees them thus simply because he has been taught to do so. In other words, he will translate his experiences according to his own particular vehicle of cognition and expression.

However, nothing can alter truth or Reality. All that changes from time to time is our personal appreciation of it and since from our nature we cannot all think alike, these modern movements towards a world religion can never succeed.

The 'fact-finding' lay commission which recently came over from America to study the missionary problem in India seems to have recognised this and did not give over-emphasis to the work of proselytising.

Certain fundamental truths are, nevertheless, the common property of every religion. These truths are the basis of all our creeds and customs and it is from them man has learnt to love the Deity. It is the sincerity of this love quite apart from the dogmatic or religious practice, which develops spiritual realisation. Not a world religion but a recognition of these principles is wanted today and in this we will find what we need most, a religious understanding. For this reason the practice of conversion should only be left in the hands of really experienced psychologists and not with the average missionary. To deprive a man of his faith, however crude, is a dangerous experiment if it cannot be replaced by something more uplifting. For this reason Mr. Gandhi's campaign of temple-entry may cause untold harm.

Arya Preacher in America:—Pandit Ayodhya Prasad, the representative and delegate of the International Aryan League, Delhi, to the World Fellowship of Faiths Conference at Chicago, informs the League that Dr. Charles S. Braden, in charge of the Department of History and Literature of Religions, North-Western University (Chicago), invited him to deliver a series of lectures on "Vedic Dharma" and that in future "Arya Samaj" shall form part of the Theological syllabus in the comparative study of religious movements in the world.

Indian Students Abroad:—Simultaneously with the Asiatic Students' Congress, the Third Convention of the Indian Students abroad was held, about 100 students attending. Mr. Subhas Chandra Bose was unanimously elected President. His Excellency De Stefani, for the Rector, welcomed the Indian students. Many useful resolutions affecting Indian students' welfare were adopted. The convention decided to reorganise the central office of the Federation and the office was shifted from London to Vienna. At the close of the Convention, there was a social gathering which was attended by prominent Italians. Under the Presidency of Mr. Bose a debate on "What Indian students learnt in Europe" was held. Thereafter the newly formed Council of the Federation met and laid down the programme of work for the next year.

ASIA AND ITALY.

The Asiatic Students Congress held in Rome on the 22nd of December last, under the auspices of the Italian Institute for the Middle and Far East which has for its object the promotion of closer association between Asia and Rome, was attended by 600 Asiatic students from different European Universities including 100 Indians headed by Mr. Subash Chandra Bose. The Italian authorities were lavish in their hospitality towards the delegates to the Congress. A crowded programme was arranged for a whole week including visits to important places. The delegates were successively received by the Governor of Rome, the Rector of the Rome University and the Pope.

In his inaugural speech on the opening day of the Congress, Signor Mussolini said :—

"I am indeed happy to welcome this first gathering of students from every country of Asia in Rome upon this Hill which has played so great a part in the history of civilisation. Your arrival is by no means without significance. A man once said and many others have since thought and repeated that "East is East and West is West and the twain shall never meet. Historically the relationship had always been one of reciprocity and such a statement is nonsense. Twenty centuries ago Rome achieved a union in the Mediterranean between the East and the West which has been of tremendous importance in world's history. Rome colonised the West but in the East,—in Egypt, in Syria and in Persia,—she attempted to foster a creative understanding. This union was the cornerstone of our entire history and it gave rise to the European civilisation. This must now become "universal" once more or else it must perish. The unity of the Mediterranean Civilisation, which was the East and the West welded into one by Rome, lasted well over a thousand years.

"But new currents of traffic, the increasing flow of gold and the exploitation of rich and distant countries gave rise to Capitalism as the basis of a new civilisation of a materialistic and exclusive character with its seat far from the Mediterranean. It was then that all intercourse between the East and the West came to be placed exclusively on the footing of mere subordination and was restricted to a purely material sphere. Every spiritual link tending to a creative collaboration came to an end and the belief became widespread that Europe and Asia must be antagonists. And the cause of all this was merely a type of mentality existing in some parts of Europe which was incapable or unwilling to understand Asia, which considered Asia as a market for produce and a fountain-head for raw materials. Its failure is, therefore, being felt in each continent. Therefore it is a matter of deep concern for all the continents to follow the reaction against the degeneration of the capitalistic system.

"This reaction has found its expression in the revolutionary faith of Italian Fascism which has fought against the lack of soul and ideal of this civilisation that in the last few centuries has prevailed throughout the world. In the evils under which Asia suffers in its resentment, we see the reflection of "our own self." The differences are in details; the foundation is the same. To-day Rome and the Mediterranean, through this Fascist renewal, look again towards resuming their historical function of unification. That is why this new Italy has invited you here. More than once in the past,—in periods of fearful crises—the world's civilisation has been saved by the co-operation of the Orient and Rome. In to-day's crisis of the whole system of the institution, the ideas of which are soulless and which paralyse mankind, we hope to resume the old tradition of our constructive co-operation."

After Signor Mussolini's speech the President of the Congress and three delegates, a Persian, an Arab and an Indian, spoke reciprocating the sympathy expressed by the Italian Premier. Before dispersing, the Congress decided to establish a permanent Bureau in Rome and continue useful work for Asia. Mr. Amya Sarkar, an Indian student and Madame Suzanne Liao, a Chinese lady were appointed Joint Secretaries of the Bureau.

PAN-ASIAN CONGRESS IN TOKYO.

Pan-Asia, by reviving the common civilization of Asia born 5,090 years ago, and by unifying the common spirit of Asiatic peoples to-day through honest co-operative effort of youth, was given emphasis in the eloquence of many tongues at the Hibiya Public Hall on 16th December, when the Congress of Young Asia was held under the auspices of the Seinen Kyodan, the Young Men's Cultural Organisation.

Young men from Turkey, Persia, Afghanistan, India, Siam, Annam, the Malayas, Indonesia, the Philippines and Manchukuo stood on the platform to address the capacity assembly of more than 4,000 persons who had jammed into the auditorium by one o'clock, when the conclave was opened.

The main thread in the address of all the representatives stressed the vital need for Asiatic unity and co-operation if Asia is to advance both culturally and materially. Prejudices among Asiatic countries was admitted, but there was agreement in the opinion that deep in their hearts the peoples of Asia want a united Asia.

With nine flags (including the tri-coloured Indian National Congress flag) of various Asiatic nations as their background, the young representatives faced an audience that cheered and applauded their sentiments.

"Let us ever cherish the cultural heritages of Asia and let us, through a united Asia, hold high the torch of our ideals to enlighten ourselves and the world toward justice, morality and peace," one of the representatives declared. "We have been subdued into a state of fear complex by the overwhelming brilliance of western civilisation and its materialism, and we have turned to self-suppression. But we have a culture of which we are proud. Let us awaken to the realization that while the West is advancing its own civilization, we must make Asia a noble Asia."

Another speaker stressed the fact that he feels the necessity of a unified and progressive Asia all the more when he realizes the humility of being under the "claws of European nations which have set foot in Asia." Human equality must be exalted not through demand, but through an honest effort that will attain the qualifications and requisites of equality, he said.

Several of the speakers appealed to the Japanese people to be the torchbearer of an united Asia. One speaker said:

"Japan, progressive and mighty Japan, with the cultural heritages of Asia and the material strength of the West, must not betray her Asiatic brethren. She belongs to Asia as the leader of Asia. We sincerely ask Japan to use all her resources and all her power and influence to take the lead in Asiatic unification."

Spontaneous applause met the statement of the speaker from Annam when he said, "My personal wish, if it can be carried out, is to ask China honestly and sincerely to cease her dependence for national existence on European and American diplomacy."

I want to ask her to emphasize her diplomacy and her unbreakable relations with the peoples of Asia. And I ask Japan to stimulate China to win them over to the idea of unity and co-operation for the constructive progress in Asia. I want also to make the statement: Japan, stimulate our neighbour China, but please avoid stimulating her to antagonism."

After the addresses of the representatives from 10 Asiatic countries, Mr. Rinsho Makino, chairman and one of the leaders of the Seinen Kyodan, read the Preamble of the Congress of Young Asia, and the English translation.

The latter part of the Congress included messages and addresses of high government officials, political leaders and city officials. They included representatives of Prince Konoyo, president of the House of Peers; General Araki, War Minister; Mr. Ryutaro Nagai, Overseas Minister; Mr. Hatoyama, Education Minister; Mayor T. Ushizuka; Mr. Yosuke Matsouka and Mr. Mitsuru Toyama, leader of the Black Dragon Society, who attended in person and had his message read by his representative.

All the speakers agreed on the necessity of a unified, peaceful and a co-operative Asia that will promote the highest ideals of the race. The revival of the spiritual civilization of Asiatic races, they said, has strength and purpose and is a sound basis upon which to lay the foundations of a new Asia.

The Congress opened with the singing of "Kimigayo," (Japan's national anthem) and an address by Mr. Kumpai Matsumoto, president of the Seinen Kyodan and former member of Diet. It concluded with the singing of the Japanese National Anthem and banzai.

The preamble of the Congress in part declared that Asia is the cradle of the human race and the origin of human civilization, and that Asia already had a flourishing civilisation before the Christian Era. But Asia has bowed before the imperialistic and materialistic advance of the West, and the glory that was Asia's is no more, the preamble went on to say. Now is the time for the youths of Asia to band together and revive the ancient traditions and culture of the East. Only by youth bravely facing the realities of the modern world and fostering mutual goodwill among themselves can the Asiatic races come to their own.

When the inspiration of the past arises in the heart of Asia's youths, then shall Asia find her way illuminate, the preamble said.

The platform of five articles adopted by the Congress included the points that Asia must be a happy home for the Asiatic races; a firm conviction in a new spirit of mutual understanding, sympathy, co-operation and unity must be interwoven among the peoples of Asia; the spirit of Asia demands freedom and justice, liberation from all forms of slavery and oppression; Asiatic youths must unite and co-operate for the fulfilment of these aims through the inspiration of the past; and the new spirit of Asia promises to humanity the rise of a higher and happier world from the ashes of materialistic modern civilisation.

India was represented by Mr. Rash Behari Bose, and two other young Indian gentlemen.

Sir C. V. Raman's Religion:—The Bangalore Association at its annual meeting had for its principal speaker Sir C. V. Raman, says the Young Men of India. He went on to tell something of his own religious history, how as a boy he had "narrowly escaped being converted to Christianity", and would have been but for the restraining influence of his mother. Thereafter he became a Theosophist, after that a Buddhist, and then "a man of science, and then nothing at all."

INDIA AND GERMANY.

Germany's friendship with India, is continuous. It extends to every sphere of activity and is not confined to the appreciation of India's religious and philosophic past. It is an open secret that Rhodes Scholarships and many other types of scholarships and exhibitions, obtaining in the British Empire, are not open to Indians, mainly on racial or political grounds. But in Germany many scholarships—though modest in size and value—have been created with the object of enabling the Indian students of moderate resources to continue or complete their studies in this country. In Berlin itself, there have been years when four or five Indian students got a scholarship of 125 rupees a month, even though the competition for them from various European countries—including American and Canada—was intense, writes Dr. D. N. Bannarjee in the Bombay Chronicle.

But it is not for what she gives to Indian students in terms of stipend or exemption from University fees and other facilities that Germany must be appreciated. Germans of all classes and walks of life welcome us as Aryan brothers; they appreciate our great men, they identify themselves with what is permanent and creative in our life and culture; they sympathise with our struggle for complete self-expression. Many are the happy memories that Indian students must carry with them, of encouragement and help received from the Professors, of warm welcome in German homes, of inspiration received from fellow-students and friends. It is important, therefore, that the two countries should continue to cherish for each other sentiments of friendship and high esteem, as it is only on such a foundation that a right understanding and continuous interest in each other's welfare is possible. It is in India's own interest that more Indian students should come to Germany for scientific and technical instruction, that a systematic exchange of professors and students should take place between the two countries and that trade relations should develop between them.

INDIANS IN SOUTH AFRICA.*

The committee recently appointed by Mr. Hofmeyr, Minister of the Interior whose members are Messrs. J. Young (chairman), P. F. Kincaid, G. Heaton Nicholls, M. P. and S. R. Naidoo and whose terms of reference are to explore the possibilities of a colonisation scheme for settling Indians, both from India and from South Africa, in other countries and to find out how many Indians from the Union would be prepared to take advantage of such a scheme, concluded its sittings in Durban. It will meet again in Pretoria on December 20 and in Capetown on January 9, when the South African Indian Congress, it is learnt, will submit their statement which runs to about thirty fullcap sheets.

The report is expected to be published at the end of January.

EVIDENCE IN DURBAN.

The committee heard evidence from Mr. H. Clarke, of the Lion Match Factory, and Mr. E. C. Rees, Manager of African Explosives.

Vital statistics of the Indian population in Natal show that although the death rate has been reduced since the early days of immigration by a tremendous margin, the birth rate is still one of the highest in the world.

Mr. H. Robinson, Acting Protector of Indian Immigrants, who was questioned by the Committee submitted figures which adequately bear testimony to this, and according to the details secured by a representative of the Natal Advertiser it is apparent that the death rate and emigration alone cannot by any means prevent an increase of the Indian population proportionately far in excess of that of the European population.

The Indian population of Natal at the end of last year was 150,483 (this figure representing immigrant Indians and their descendants only and not passenger Indians, who number thousands.) This represents a net increase in eight years of 23,291.

Up to the end of last month the births among Indians this year totalled 5,200 and the deaths 1,646, while approximately 700 returned to India under the assisted emigration scheme. It will be seen, therefore, that during the 11 months there was a net increase of nearly 3,000.

In 1926 the Indian birth rate was 56.79 and the death rate 13.98. Both figures showed a slight decrease in later years, and last year the birth rate fell from 51.61 in the previous year to 42.62 and the death rate rose from 12.86 to 20.45. The exceptionally high rise in deaths was due mainly to the epidemic of malaria, and the fall in births was also in a large measure attributable to the effects of quinine. Last year, therefore, cannot be counted as normal, and to obtain a fairer comparison it is better to take the figures for 1931 and compare them with the Union European birth rate of 24.40 and the death rate of 9.37, which clearly indicate that while the death rate among Indians is not considerably above that of Europeans the birth rate is more than double.

At one time the exodus of Indians was fairly high, reaching a peak figure in 1928 at 3,400, but recent totals have been much lower, and it is considered that four vessels a year carrying from 250 to 300 passengers each represent the steady level of emigration.

KUNWAR MAHARAJ SINGH'S EVIDENCE.

The Agent of the Government of India, Kunwar Sir Maharaj Singh, came specially from Johannesburg last Saturday to give evidence before the Colonisation Committee. The Agent said he did not think there was any chance of the Government financing a scheme of colonisation to British Guiana. He believed that the economic depression precluded consideration of colonisation to any country, and he did not think the settlement of Indians, even from India, in British Guiana would be practicable. He did not think the Indians from South Africa would fit into conditions in British Guiana, whose climate was much less healthy than that of South Africa.

In reply to Mr. Young, the Agent said he did not wish to make a statement, but he would be glad to reply to any questions. He wanted to explain, however, that his report on the colonisation of British Guiana made in 1925, which the Committee had read, dealt exclusively with the settlement from the United Provinces of India where there was great congestion and poverty.

He had recommended the colonisation of Indians in British Guiana in 1925 under a definite scheme by which the men would be given land and money to build houses and buy implements and seeds. His suggestion had been adopted by the Government of British Guiana but had never been carried out owing to lack of finance.

The Government of British Guiana had been willing to finance the scheme, for there was at that time a shortage of labour in the Colony and it was anticipated that the new settlers would be free to work on the sugar estates for six months in the year.

The climate of the coastal area of British Guiana was more equable than that of the United Provinces, but was not as good as the climate of Natal, which he considered was one of the best in the world.

He did not think there was any chance of the Indian Government itself financing a colonisation scheme in British Guiana.

Mr. Nichols: Surely that would be the financial responsibility of India?

As far as he knew, said the Agent, and he had a lot to do with the colonisation of Indians from India, the Government of India had never considered financing any colonisation scheme.

"In my opinion," he said, "the present economic position puts out of consideration colonisation from any one country to any other country. In almost every country in the world there is unemployment. There is considerable unemployment in British Guiana where the rice industry is in a precarious position. The sugar industry has also been very badly hit."

The Committee suggested to the Kunwar that there might be a country with scarcely any population where extensive colonisation could be carried out if sufficient finance could be secured. The Kunwar, however, considered it impracticable, for he did not admit that it could be financed.

The members of the Committee suggested that Borneo, which had the same climate as Ceylon, might prove a suitable place for colonisation. The Kunwar said, however, he knew nothing about the country except that it was inhabited by savage head-hunters. "As far as I know the Government of India has no scheme for the colonisation of Borneo and I would not like to commit them to the smallest degree."

"I know of no country suitable for colonisation and having regard to the present world wide depression I should be very surprised to hear of any country where colonisation is possible. It would be impracticable in British Guiana at the present time."

The Kunwar said that he did not think that the Natal Indians would fit into the conditions in British Guiana. They would find it difficult to adjust themselves, for the Indian from India had a lower standard of living, was less dependant and was less westernised.

Mr. Nicholls: Assuming India was serious about colonisation, would not the India from South Africa, after his training in the art of colonisation and with his greater efficiency through his contact with western standards, enhance such a scheme, presuming he would go?—I presume they would not go, and further I do not think colonists from South Africa and colonists from India would fit in with one another.

LADY MAHARAJ SINGH ON INDIAN WOMANHOOD.

The following appeared in the "Rand Daily Mail" of South Africa:

"Give the Indian women in your midst the same chance as they get in my country and see if you cannot find another poet like Sarojini Naidu," said the Kunwarani Lady Maharaj Singh in an address to the Overseas League.

"Are you afraid of educating them? You make what use you can of them, and then allow them to die like flies. Any decent woman would be aroused to indignation by the conditions in which my people live. You call them coolies and say they belong to a humble class. A coolie is an honest labourer. I are proud to belong to my coolie people who supply labour for you who are too lazy or not strong enough to do your own work. What were your people when they came out to this country, probably with not sixpence in their pockets either? Many of your people are just as unfit. My people do not get drunk and disorderly, or commit crimes of murder and indecency. They are decent, law abiding people. Are you afraid of us?

"One per cent of the population in the Transvaal is Indian, yet not even primary education is free for the poor Indian. Your servant pays for your spoonfed education. You do not give our little girls a chance to develop. They live in miserable hovels. The greed and selfishness of the Europeans is appalling.

"Our Indians have been here for three generations. They are as South African as you are. You can make them an asset to your country. We are proud inheritors of Aryan blood.

"If you think you can continue to be South Africans of the European type you are living on false foundations. You must fuse all elements to have a culture of your own. You cannot have it in water-tight compartments.

"The Sermon on the Mount is the sound standard of government. Until the world realises this, conferences and commissions of inquiry will be useless."

The Kunwarani led up to her impassioned appeal for consideration for the Indian people by giving an impression of the life of women in India in the past and the present day. She explained various customs, described the family life of the past when women were economically dependent and lived a humdrum existence in seclusion.

Yet in spite of these handicaps Indian princesses had led their armies to victory and were saints and writers.

She described the work of Ramabai, a woman pioneer of 70 years ago, who, after studying in England and the United States, bought a village in India and taught women to become citizens. She did a great work for her nation, and at her death there were 1,200 women and girls in her village learning trades and going to Universities.

Hindoo women now were highly educated. Many were doing excellent service for their country as doctors, lawyers, barristers, heads of schools and universities. Women's colleges were affiliated with the Universities.

"Women in India will be given equal franchise with men," said the Kunwarani, "because we have deserved it and because we have worked for the good of our country."

"India is the mother of most of the culture of the world," said the Kunwarani. "Our Sanskrit is the mother of all classics. Aryan people have been ancestors of most of the Hindoos in India. Your scholars in Europe have to make a study of Sanskrit before they can appreciate the highest in literature." She referred to the famous epics, "Ramayana" and "Mahabharata," which all people who claimed high culture must know as well as the "Iliad" and the "Odyssey."

The Kunwarani paid a tribute to the many noble people who had the cause of the Indian at heart. But she felt a frank talk was necessary to make the majority think.

Bombay Swadeshi League—The Bombay Swadeshi League has arranged a series of public lectures in Bombay from this month on various topics connected with Swadeshi. The series of lectures will be inaugurated by Mr. K. F. Nariman with an address on "Students and Economic Swaraj" to be delivered on Saturday January 20, at 8 p. m. at the Bhavatsky Lodge Theosophical Society Hall, French Bridge, Chowpatty Bombay. Mrs. Sarojini Naidu will preside.

THE BIG POWERS AND DISARMAMENT.

(BY BERTRAM PICKARD.)

The Disarmament Conference to all intents and purposes stands adjourned until the middle of January following the meeting of the League Council. Despite the many political and technical complexities of the disarmament question the broad problem facing the Powers is really a very simple one. There is universal agreement that the Disarmament Conference cannot end in a Convention under which Germany will be permitted to rearm whilst everyone else keeps the armaments they have. This would be to fly in the face of an overwhelming demand from public opinion for some disarmament, not to mention the repeated undertakings of statesmen at the Conference to reduce as well as limit armaments.

But, since the other Great Powers will refuse to apply a Convention which does not include Germany; and since the German Government and people have shown that they are determined to have equality of rights (which does not mean equality of armaments at once however) the choice is obvious. Either there must be more and speedier disarmament on the part of other powers than has yet been proposed to Germany, or there will be no Convention.

That is not all, however. The French Government is very loath to disarm in view of the present temper in Germany. France demands what she calls 'guarantees of execution'. This means that supposing a party to the Convention were found later to be violating the terms of the Convention and secretly arming, then something must be done collectively by the other signatories to prevent such illegal preparations. This is surely a very reasonable point of view, but it involves a larger measure of international solidarity and esprit de corps than has yet been evident. The Sino-Japanese dispute is a case in point.

The moral of all this is not just that the situation is hopeless and disarmament impossible. The moral is this: Disarmament is one part, though an essential one, of the larger task of organising peace; and if you want peace you will have to pay a big price for it in the sacrifice of national sovereignty in many directions.

But the alternative to this is—War!

THE ANGLO-INDIAN COMMUNITY.

(BY SHORAN S. SINGHA.)

You have given publicity to Colonel Gidney's memorandum on the future of the Anglo-Indians. They deserve this sympathy undoubtedly. But there is another side of the picture which needs to be understood by the British public and faced frankly by the Anglo-Indians themselves.

Why Europeans in India show a cold shoulder to the Anglo-Indians is for the former to answer. My purpose is to clear the air so far as the Indian side is concerned, from what I have seen and know.

If the Anglo-Indians find themselves pushed into the corner by the Indians, is it entirely the latter's fault? I do not agree with Colonel Gidney that, because of their great loyalty shown to the Empire, they are meeting with unfriendliness from the Indians. During the war there were hundreds of thousands of Indians who fought for the Empire and whose loyalty could not be questioned. They are not being either persecuted or being given a cold shoulder because of that. The reason, if we are to be honest, lies in the fact that the Anglo-Indian had been far too concerned to associate himself with the history and institutions of what Colonel Gidney calls his 'fatherland' and very little with his 'motherland'. He has been very lacking in the knowledge of the culture of India, whether historical or architectural or philosophical. He has been more or less ashamed of the Indian side of his nationality. The darker he is, the more has been his ignorance of things Indian.

Moreover, and this is much more serious than the lack of intellectual interest, the attitude and behaviour of the Anglo-Indians towards the Indians has been anything but cordial or courteous. The average Englishman will think twice before he uses the word 'native' to an Indian, but the Anglo-Indian has been free in its use, either to a main's face or when talking of Indians with another of his fraternity.

It has been a very painful thing at times to come across one's fellow Indian Christians who change their names into an anglicised form for the sake of better jobs and disown their own relations if they come across them in Indian clothes.

While I quite agree with Colonel Gidney that his community should be given every possible facility to advance, a great deal of work towards creating a better and saner outlook towards the people amongst whom the Anglo-Indians' lot is cast would be worth while. Given the right kind of education and a larger vision, the Anglo-Indians could be a great factor in bridging the gulf between Britain and India.

BASIC ENGLISH.

An editorial in the Indian Witness under date of December 7th puts before us India's language problems. A few sentences from that editorial set forth the need of a common language so well that they are worth quoting as an introduction to our subject.

"The World gets forward through the extension of a common understanding and the language that is most widely understood will help most. For India that language may be English but it will be a greatly transformed English."

Perhaps there are many readers of the Witness who are not yet acquainted with "Basic English" which, it is hoped, may be the "greatly transformed English" required. It is already in use in many countries of Europe and in Asiatic countries like Japan. It is claimed that adults of average ability can learn to speak and read Basic English in a few weeks if their native language is European. If it is one of the languages not so closely allied to English, the process of acquiring it will take more time but can be accomplished in a few months instead of requiring years, as does the average English course.

The vocabulary of Basic English is primarily limited to 850 words, 600 nouns, of which 200 are picturable. Gramophone records of these words can be bought and the student can acquire the correct pronunciation of them from these records even if a teacher is not at hand. Such an exercise would prove valuable in addition to the teacher, as the best English accent can be secured from the records, and that is not always true of the teacher.

In addition to the nouns other essentials of English are given but no luxuries. A book of simple rules called the A. B. C. of Basic English should be in the hands of the teacher. If this were translated into a language which the student already knows, he could teach himself. It teaches the forming of the plurals of the nouns, the declension of pronouns, the uses of propositions, adjectives, adverbs, etc. Very few verbs are given and conjugations are luxuries to be dispensed with.

Eight hundred and fifty words can easily be mastered and then real conversations are possible. This is not pidgin English. It is correct as far as it goes and the claim is made that the student that continues his studies beyond its limits will have nothing to unlearn.

Ten books concerning the value of Basic English and its application to business and science are available. This includes a dictionary which puts 7,500 words most used in ordinary English into Basic English. In addition to the above books, such classics as Lamb's Stories from Shakespeare, Julius Caesar, Stories from the Bible, Robinson Crusoe, etc., etc., can be secured in Basic English. They are all one price, 2s 6d, or Re. 1-14-0 per volume. These may be secured from Kegan Paul, Trench, Trubner & Co. Ltd., Broadway House, Carter Lane, E. C. London, if they are not carried by your local book dealer. Most up-to-date book stores in India handle them.—L. J. in Indian Witness.

FREUDIAN FALLACY.

The London correspondent of the Hindu writes:— Since what is called psycho-analysis, expounded originally by Dr. Freud, became so popular a study and served so generally to explain that which was previously considered unexplainable, nobody has dared to criticise it vigorously in public to the extent which, by implication, Dr. Cyril Burt did in an address before the Winter School for Health Visitors and School Nurses at Bedford College for Women.

Dr. Burt is professor of Psychology in the University of London and one of the first things he did in his address was to criticise the common belief that human sex instincts are so strong and so violent that it is difficult for people to withstand them. Many people, said Dr. Burt, were actually hypnotised into thinking that they could not possibly fight against these temptations.

"As a matter of fact, we attach far too much importance to the sex instinct," he added, "and people who have been brought up in a medical or biological home are amazed at the nonsense which is talked about the temptations of sex. Actually the sex instinct is a comparatively weak affair, in the human race. Instincts that are no longer absolutely necessary tend to weaken and die down. Hunger is a much more violent instinct in human beings."

"You hear people saying that sexual immorality and promiscuity will never be stemmed because the sex instinct is so strong, whereas the sex instinct is no more violent than the acquisitive or pugnacious instincts, both of which we have been able to control."

A great deal which was put down to sex was merely curiosity in the child. Regarding the age at which sex instruction should be given, roughly speaking, if a child had been brought up properly the correct time was when the child asked for it.

Dr. Burt thought that fear was one of the things which psychologists would have to discover and treat in the near future.

Mrs. C. D. Rackham said that it was generally assumed that unemployment among young people was the cause of much juvenile crime to-day. But she suggested that overwork, together with monotonous and uncongenial work, was just as likely to be the cause of juvenile crime as lack of work. Thus in this machine age, when much of the work was bound to be monotonous, they should aim at getting hours of labour as short as possible, so that the effect on the young worker was not too bad. They must also provide opportunities for wise and useful leisure.

LEAGUE'S REPLY TO THE MAHASABHA.

The following is the text of the letter received by the Hindu Mahasabha, New Delhi, from the Secretary-General of the League of Nations in connection with protection of minorities :—

I am writing in acknowledgment of your letter of the 19th October, enclosing a copy of the full text of the Resolution No. 2, passed at Ajmer on the 14th, 15th, and 16th of October 1933, the summary of which you had already been good enough to cable me.

I am venturing to send you under separate cover the following documents : (1) Protection of Linguistic, Racial and Religious Minorities by the League of Nations Provisions contained in the various international instruments at present in force, C. L. 110. 1927 I (Annex.) (2) Resolutions and Extracts from the Minutes of the Council, Resolutions and Reports adopted by the Assembly, relating to the procedure to be followed in questions concerning the Protection of Minorities, C. 8. M. 5. 1931 I (3) Pamphlets concerning the Protection of Minorities and (4) Protection of Minorities. Discussions in the sixth Committee of the XIV Session of the Assembly C. 634 1933 I.

From these documents you will be in a position to judge the legal commitments of the League in connection with the subject of the protection of minorities. You will observe that the responsibility of the League in connection with the protection of minorities is based either on special treaties concluded between certain Governments and dealing in each case with the protection of a minority in a specified state, or on declarations made by certain Governments and dealing in each case with the protection of a minority in a specified state, or on declarations made by certain Governments, members of the League, by which they have accorded to the Council of the League certain responsibilities in connection with the protection of minorities in their countries.

There is no provision in the Government of the League of Nations which would admit of an extension of its rights and responsibilities of the Council in connection with the protection of minorities in any country not covered by such treaties or declarations, except as the result of official Governmental initiative and the consent of the Government concerned.

The Council has no powers in regard to protection of minorities in the case of countries which are not bound by such treaties and declarations, and the resolution which you quote, which was adopted at the third Assembly of the League and which was again repeated at the last Assembly, could not confer any powers on the Council.

The resolution which you brought to my notice refers also to Article 11 of the Covenant. This article applies only to cases of war or threat of war and in circumstances affecting international peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends and it can only be invoked by Governments.

I trust that these explanations and the documents I am sending you will be of value to you and show clearly what is the legal position in connection with the subject of protection of minorities.—United Press.

Bose Researches :—The interest aroused in the researches made at the Bose Researches Institute under the able guidance of Sir J. C. Bose has been so great that French and German editions of the works have been published. Timiriazooff, the eminent Russian plant-physiologist, has given an account of these discoveries in Russian language. The interest evinced in Poland has been equally great and it is learnt that permission has been asked for a Polish edition of the account of some of the important researches carried out at the Institute.

WOMEN'S VIEWS ON BIRTH CONTROL.

At the concluding session of the All-India Women's Conference held at Calcutta, interesting discussion centred round the resolution demanding birth control which runs thus.

"In view of the appalling hygienic and economic conditions of society, this Conference is of opinion that immediate efforts be made to spread scientific knowledge on birth control amongst parents through the medium of recognised clinics."

The resolution was moved by Mrs. S. N. Ray, who sought to meet the arguments that were advanced generally against it on the ground of morality.

Miss Rani Ghosh who opposed the resolution, contested that many members of the audience would question her right to speak on the subject as she had not experienced of labour that a woman undergoes when a child is born. But it appeared to her to be undignified for the Conference to discuss openly a subject which should be settled between a husband and wife in the bed-room. She could well remember the agitation they had when the subject came up for discussion in Madras and also in Lucknow when the resolution on the subject was carried with great majority. She enquired what practical work had been effected by the Conference in the direction within the course of a year or two.

To judge the number that one wished to have in the family by advocating birth-control seemed to her to be a futile task. All of them have their own standards of value by which they would measure the worth of the pleasures, privileges and duties, comforts, and satisfaction of life. What was meant for one might prove poison for another. By championing the cause of birth-control at this time in this country they would be beaten as a nation by a decrease in its numerical strength. Could India at this critical stage of her history afford a cause which would decrease her number. She asked the audience to realise the responsibility for having to take such a course when the new reforms were to come and when for the army, navy and for the development of economic and material resources of the country they would be handicapped. At the present moment India was steeped in darkness and men and women who were real representatives of India were in want of food not because they had not been taught to control the birth but because adequate provision had not been made for them for the development of their physical, mental and moral capabilities. Let those who favoured birth-control teach the masses to respect themselves to control their purse instead of births.

Mrs. A. Kale supporting the resolution said by way of introducing herself that she was the mother of five children while she found it to be a matter of wonder that most of them who opposed the resolution were unmarried. Many of them were under the wrong impression that birth control meant birth prevention. Nobody would bother with the number of children if adequate provision for their upbringing could be arranged for. Nobody would question the fine civilisation that was developed in India once when other nations like pilgrims had to come to India for learning. But the question was the present position in which they were placed. Birth control was a means that was absolutely necessary for getting rid of the present crisis. As soon as it would be over when India would be able to adequately maintain her children the method should be discarded at once. Nobody had held the view that birth control was the only method which would remain in the Indian social regulations for all time to come.

The resolution was put to vote and carried by a huge majority.

NEWS OF THE WEEK

realpatidar.com Oldest Woman of the Punjab Dies :—

Probably the oldest woman of the Punjab and certainly one of the oldest, died in Lahore, aged 111½ years. Srimati Shubadevi was born in 1822 and her centenary was celebrated by her family in 1922. In perfect health, the old lady retained keenness of the mind and alertness of the body till the end and both her sight and hearing were good. The death was due to heart failure. Srimati Shubadevi leaves behind four grandchildren the eldest of whom is 55.

India and Italy :—The Consul-General for Italy in Calcutta has offered the Calcutta University an endowment for two scholarships of Rs. 10 each to be awarded to students securing the highest number of marks in the Italian language at the Matriculation examination and taking up Italian in the Intermediate course. The Consul-General has also proposed, understands the "Amritbazar Patrika," to place at the disposal of the University the services of a scholar for teaching the subject, his honorarium being met from the endowment. The Consul-General desires that no extra fees should be charged from the students for learning the language.

Indian Academy of Sciences :—When the Indian Science Congress meets again next year, a carefully prepared scheme for the establishment of an Indian Academy of Sciences will be laid before it. The preliminary work of drafting a constitution for the Academy is to begin forthwith. A Committee, comprising, among others, representatives of the Asiatic Society, Bengal, the Indian Chemical Society, the Indian Botanical Society, the Mining and Geological Institute, the Indian Mathematical Society and representatives of the various departments will, it is expected, meet in Calcutta from the 18th January to the 21st January, to discuss the necessary steps.

Japanese Delegation to Afghanistan :—A Japanese Delegation, consisting of Mr. Ippei Tanaka, (leader) Taro Yamamoto and Heidezo Yama Nouich departed for Kabul on Sunday. Interviewed prior to their departure, they stated they were proceeding to Kabul as official representatives of the Foreign Ministry of Japan with a view to cementing the friendly relations between the two countries. They expected to stay in Kabul for a month. They landed at Colombo on January 6 and after three days' stay at Bombay left for Kabul.

Assyrian Refugees :—The vexed problem of the settlement of Assyrian refugees is seemingly approaching a solution following a communication from the Brazilian Government agreeing to the settlement of the refugees in Brazil, providing that they are agriculturists and that the Brazilian Government is not involved in any expense in connection with such a settlement. The League of Nations Committee is still discussing the Brazilian Government's conditions and the consent of both the Government of Iraq and the Assyrians is necessary before any final arrangement is possible.—Reuter.

Indian Unity :—In an interview with the "United Press", Pandit Jawaharlal gave the following message to Bengal: "My message to young Bengal is the same that I wish to give to the whole of India. All of us stand or fall together or to quote a famous writer, let us hang together or we hang separately. The problem of India is one and indivisible. It cannot be separated into Provinces or even as between Indian States and the rest of India. The sorrows and misfortunes of one Province are the sorrows and misfortunes of the whole of India. Likewise, the triumph of one Province is the triumph of All India. Therefore, though we may function in separate areas and spheres, we work for the same ideal, namely, the salvation of our Motherland. We in other Provinces feel keenly the misfortunes of our countrymen in Bengal although the whole country at present is in the grip of the severest type of repression. One of the objects of my visit is to convey to our brothers and sisters of Bengal how very much the rest of India is watching with anxious interest the happenings in this Province, and how much they desire to show their solidarity with this Province."

NOTES

Mr. Devadhar's Address:—In his presidential address to the National Social Conference held in Madras last month Mr. G. K. Devadhar reviewed the past history of the Conference and offered several valuable hints for the future of the movement. The results of the movement so far have not fallen short of expectations. The old complaint that people who preached reform did not practise it, is no longer true. On the contrary many people nowadays are practical social reformers without being interested in the movement. They may not even like to be called social reformers. Their daughters remain unmarried upto a late age, attend schools and colleges, even go to foreign countries for study, take part in sports and disregard the caste restrictions which sat so heavily on their mothers and grandmothers. Still, the families remain orthodox Hindus. Mr Devadhar was, therefore, not quite correct in complaining of the neglect of social reform by educated Indians. The time when social reform was practised as a matter of principle is passed. It has become normal and a part of Hindu social life. We have already noticed Mr. Devadhar's observant remark about the Anti-Touchability Movement with special reference to temple entry. He warned reformers against placing wrong emphasis on wrong principles. A right grasp of principles is what differentiates purposive social reform from aimless social innovation. Social reform leaders have a double function: The engine has to pull up the social train when its track lies uphill and act as a brake when it lies downhill. At the present time there is need for both the functions to be exercised with prudence and caution.

• A Confession of Failure:—The Government of Bengal makes a noteworthy confession of the failure of its measures so far adopted to cope with terrorism in the province. It is bringing in a Bill to make the existing temporary law permanent and in the statement of objects and reasons we learn that in the opinion of Government terrorist conspiracy has unfortunately gone past the stage when it can be regarded as an ephemeral movement. In other words the evil from being an epidemic has become endemic. The Government of Bengal nevertheless persists in its faith in the policy, exemplified in the orders of the District Magistrate of Chittagong which we print in our news columns. Commenting on these orders The Servant of India makes the following apt observations: "In attempting to furnish a raison d'être for the orders at a representative meeting held at Chittagong the next day after their issue, the District Magistrate was constrained to admit that the actual number of terrorists was perhaps very small. His fear (however) was that they were being assisted by large numbers of people. We do not know how far the fear is well grounded. But even assuming it to be not lacking in foundation, it would be difficult to justify such exceptionally severe restrictions upon the freedom of movement of a large section of the population. Rounding up terrorists and controlling their nefarious activities are matters to which no reasonable objection can be taken by anybody; but to issue exasperatingly vexatious orders of the kind referred to is really to carry matters too far. It serves to penalise large numbers of innocent and law-abiding people for the misdeeds of a very small number of the mischievously-inclined variety. This must be avoided at all costs. We cannot persuade ourselves that this very necessary precaution is observed in connection with these orders. In their ruthless war on terrorism, the authorities must see to it that their measures, so far as their rigour is concerned, do not exceed the strict needs of the situation. For if they did, their execution, while removing one evil, would create another, not less serious by any means, by adding to the existing volume of political discontent."

• Emperor of Manchuria:—The idea of creating an Emperor of Manchuria and the restoration of the deposed boy-Emperor of China to the office, are events of far-reaching significance. The Emperor of Manchuria has the great advantage of being a Manchu himself. He comes of a long race of Emperors and as such is sure to evoke the loyalty and patriotism of his subjects. The revolutionary leaders of China made a great mistake in deposing the Emperor and discarding the Imperial office. The Chinese people have not taken kindly to the Republic and China has lost ground steadily under the new-fangled constitution. It is quite possible that now that the Imperial dignity has been restored in the old Chinese Province, China itself may be drawn towards re-union with Manchuria and that the ancient Empire may be revived and may become the means of conferring unity and the strength which comes of unity on our north-eastern neighbour. The Japanese have acted with wisdom and circumspection in their policy in Manchuria, whatever one may think of the methods by which they acquired control of its affairs.

Andhra Province:—The cry of "Andhra for the Andhras" which was strident some years ago had not been much heard of since the introduction of the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms. An explanation that has been suggested, is that the Madras Ministers under the reforms have been mostly Andhras and the grievance of the Telugu-speaking population that its interests suffered owing to being included in the Madras Presidency, has thus been found to be untenable. We are surprised that the Northern Circars' Indian Christian Conference which met at Guntur on the 20th January raked up this old demand in a resolution advocating the constitution of the Telugu-speaking districts into a separate Andhra Province simultaneously with the inauguration of the future constitutional reforms. The only explanation for this desire on the part of Andhra Indian Christians, would seem to be that the large majority of Indian Christians are in the Tamil districts and the Telugu Christians expect to fare better as regards representation in the legislature and other bodies if Andhra was made a separate Province. Mr. C. S. Ranga Iyer, who sits for an Upper India constituency in the Legislative Assembly, has given notice of a motion to make Malabar a separate province.

Indo-Japanese Agreement:—We welcomed the announcement that negotiations between India and Japan regarding their future trade relations would be conducted in this country by representatives of the two Governments assisted by non-official advisers. The negotiations are now completed and the agreement is ready for signature. It seems that it has to be signed by the Secretary of State in London and not by the Government of India. Mr. B. Das raised the question in the Legislative Assembly, pointing out that Indian representatives had signed the Treaty of Versailles. Sir Joseph Bore who negotiated the treaty, on behalf of the Government in India, thought that it was not worth while contesting this point when the terms of the new Agreement would be those settled between Indian and Japanese representatives in this country. He told Mr. Das that he was straining after a shadow when we already have the substance in our hands. This argument cuts both ways. Why should the British Government be so very punctilious about the shadow when they have left the substance in the hands of the Indian Government? What was there to prevent their giving plenipotentiary powers to Sir Joseph Bore as the Japanese Government did to Viscount Sawada? The point is one of constitutional importance and Mr. Das did well in raising it in the Assembly.

Indo-European Marriages:—The Mahratta published last week an article by Miss Ethel Sheppard, of Lahore, on intermarriages between Indian men and European women. Although she tries to be fair to the Indian husband, the impression conveyed by her observations is that the great majority of such marriages are and are bound to be unhappy, and that, on account of the faults and failures of the husband. On the first point she was promptly contradicted by Mr. Husain Malik, also of Lahore, who, while admitting that there were a few cases where such marriages had actually ended in tragedy, pointed out that in Lahore there were a good many families with European daughters-in-law without any tragic results. The problem nowadays has lost much of its complexity and European girls who marry Indians are often, indeed, more nationalist than their husbands. Miss Sheppard's suggestion that English girls marry Indian students out of pity for their loneliness, is out of date. Moreover, of late Indians who married European wives have found them in the Continent.

Causes of the Earthquake:—The Director of the Geological Survey of India has addressed a letter to the press asking for full descriptions of the earthquake shock of 15th January from observers with a view to assist in the compilation to enable its cause to be better understood. There are current at present three distinct types of explanations of the causes of the earthquake—the theological, the geological and astronomical. The latest to advance the theological explanation is Mahatma Gandhi who speaking at a mass meeting at Tinnevely referred to the calamity "as a chastisement sent by God for our sins." The geological view finds expression in the theory that there is a fault in the crust of the earth in area of Raniganj. The astronomical viewpoint claims two schools among its adherents. The first traces the cause of the earthquake to the juxtaposition of the seven planets whilst the second traces it to the appearance of a star which was seen by Cawnpore inhabitants at 2 o'clock in broad daylight on the 15th January. It would be wrong to conclude from this that the three different explanations of the earthquake are irreconcilable with each other.

The Barrows Lectures:—Dr. Shailer Mathews of Chicago is here in Bombay delivering the eighth series of Barrows Lectures. In his addresses, three of which we print this week, Dr. Mathews has broken fresh ground. Dr. Mathews and Mrs. Mathews who has accompanied her husband, have made many friends in Bombay where they have received a cordial welcome.

BOMBAY, JANUARY 27, 1934.

THE WHITE PAPER CONTROVERSY.

The scheme of constitutional reform outlined in the White Paper and explained and elaborated by the Secretary of State for India before the Joint Parliamentary Committee, has evoked a variety of comments. Sir Umar Hayat Khan, a member of the India Council in London, arrived by the Air Mail at Karachi last Saturday. He told a Press representative, as his personal opinion, that the money which has been spent on the Reforms would have been better spent had the Government granted a remission in revenue to feed the starving millions of poor India. It would also have incidentally benefited big landlords like Sir Umar himself, but that consideration, of course, was not consciously present to his mind in forming his opinion. Since, however, some reforms seemed to be inevitable he stressed the importance of Second Chambers in every province; otherwise, he thought, "there would be great danger from hot-headed young enthusiasts, doing certain acts in the absence of more mature politicians." Sir Umar explained that the Second Chamber was needed chiefly in the interests of Government. "The responsibility (for the certain acts of hot-headed young enthusiasts)," he said, "will be on the shoulders of the Government which would become more and more unpopular. But if there were two chambers, then the Governor's duty will become easier." Sir Umar is a fair representative of the landlord classes in the Punjab and elsewhere.

In the South Dewan Bahadur A. Ramaswami Mudaliar, who is one of the ablest of Indian political leaders, defended with some warmth the White Paper scheme against the severe criticism to which it was subjected in a recent speech by the Right Hon. Srinivasa Sastri. But he approved of the amendments suggested in the memorandum of the British Indian delegation and thought that a useful purpose would be served by supporting it at the proposed All Parties Conference. Mr. Sastri in his address had shown that the scheme of the White Paper as amplified in Sir Samuel Hoare's evidence before the Joint Parliamentary Committee, was a complete travesty of what India had been led to expect by authoritative declarations of the Prime Minister and Lord Irwin as Viceroy of India. But he did not believe in non-co-operation, and urged that every effort should be made to get the scheme improved and, when finally passed into law, that it should be utilised to push forward the cause of self-government. We are surprised to see that the Bombay Chronicle takes Mr. Sastri to task for saying what Mr. Brelvi in a long signed article in the Chronicle not long ago declared, should be the policy of the National Congress itself! What is sauce for the Congress swan is evidently not sauce for the Liberal rander.

Sir Hari Singh Gour, speaking at Nagpur, took the same line as Mr. Sastri. He said no one in India wanted the White Paper scheme but he feared it would be passed in perhaps an even less acceptable form; in which case he said that it should be worked for all it was worth, without relaxing our efforts to make it more satisfactory. Indian delegates to the Round Table Conference and the Joint Parliamentary Committee have generally taken the same view. Prominent Congressmen are divided in their opinion of what the proper thing to do is in relation to the scheme. None of them is in favour of the scheme but while one section would have nothing to do with it and would presumably boycott the legislatures if it is passed, another would on no account resort to this method but would, like the Constitutionalists but only more vehemently, work to accelerate the advent of full self-government. The extreme Congress view of boycotting the White Paper is thus not shared by any considerable section of articulate opinion among the politically minded classes. It has, therefore, been thought that a Conference of all Parties should meet and consider what essential changes should be made in the White Paper scheme in order that the introduction of the new Constitution may bring peace and prosperity to the country.

The mere idea has thrown some prominent publicists into a rage. They seem to think that the right to call such conferences belongs by prescription to themselves, and that it is intolerable presumption for any one else to do so. This, of course, is an untenable position. The Congress would have been the best agency to convene such a conference. But for reasons, obvious or obscure, it is not able to do so now, and, therefore some other body has to do it. The work cannot wait. The letter of invitation to the All Parties Conference has been issued to representative people irrespective of party, and is very wide in scope. Its wording regarding the Communal Award and the so-called "sanctions", has led to some criticism. What is meant is obviously not that these two questions are not of consequence. For the sake of convenience it is necessary to concentrate first on improvements in the White Paper. The Conference will evidently be free to consider any suggestions, however far-reaching in this direction. Among others, we trust that it will have the opportunity of formulating a considered recommendation on the question whether British India should enter the Federation as a unitary government or as a conglomerate of separate provinces. Another conference may be convened to deal with the two questions, when it becomes necessary to do so. By the way, it should be remembered that the Communal Award embodies the Poona Pact and those who approved the Pact tacitly accepted the former as amended by it. As for "sanctions", it is too early to talk of them.

THE EARTHQUAKE DISASTER.

Reports of the damage done by the earthquake of January 15th have been coming with greater accuracy during the week. They reveal that Bihar has been the most affected province and that, in three towns Monghyr, Muzaffarpur and Durbhanga, the total deathroll cannot be given with accuracy. The breakdown in communications has further enhanced the difficulties. The Governor of Bihar and Orissa, however, in a recent speech conveyed the impression that the number of deaths in the whole province would be roughly four thousand. Replying to a question in the Assembly Sir Harry Haig informed the members on Wednesday that in the three principally affected towns half the brick houses have been reduced to ruins and are damaged beyond repairs. In the villages destruction of house property has been less. The Railway settlements and work-shops at Jamalpur have been seriously damaged and restoration work there, it is estimated, will amount to over rupees fifty lakhs. Both Government and local bodies have suffered heavy loss owing to the destruction of public buildings as well as through the damage to roads and bridges. It has not been possible to form an adequate idea of the loss in agricultural lands but the most serious blow to cultivators comes from the destruction of the sugar factories. As for the standing crops, low-lying lands have suffered to a greater extent. Several of the affected towns were isolated from the outside world. Durbhanga, according to Mr. K. P. Jayaswal of Patna was "a solitary prison till the arrival of the plane sent from Calcutta by the Maharaja of Durbhanga on the third day. The State and Government hospitals in that town collapsed resulting in the death of their indoor patients and the Maharaja's palace was reduced to an unrecognisable heap." A Lucknow professor who had sent his family to Muzaffarpur, went there himself on receiving no reply to his urgent communications and returned with his daughter, the only surviving member of his family. Three-fourths of Muzaffarpur has been wrecked and it is reported that the dead in that city numbered about a thousand. Almost the entire population is living now in the open air or in tents.

The Times of India which has displayed commendable enterprise in presenting the latest information regarding the disaster to its readers, reported in its issue of June 20th a strange phenomenon noticed by an eye-witness of Patna, where "the waters of the Ganges subsided, as by the magic into the sands." The observer narrates that there was a dull roar followed by a hissing noise and within a few seconds the bed of the river was laid completely dry. "Opposite to where I stood," he writes, "there had been an island of sand in the middle of the stream with a narrow passage on the near side of the water and a broader stream beyond on which steamer and boats plied. Soon after the shock the island became joined to the mainland and several boats and river steamers were stranded on what had been a narrow passage. A number of bathers were left half sunk into the sand by the force of the receding waters. For the space of five minutes the river bed was dry. Then as suddenly as it had vanished before I saw the Ganges appear again spouting up from the sand with considerable force. Great cracks and fissures, some of them fifty feet long and several feet wide, appeared at irregular distances and from them columns of water shot up to a height of five or six feet with loud bursting noise. The largest fissure appeared where the island had been and as the water poured from it the sand there was thrown out and blown away. In a few seconds the level of the river had risen again and it spread from bank to bank. The Ganges had resumed its interrupted flow. The phenomenon described above must have been witnessed by numerous individuals, particularly in view of the fact that the eye-witness observed a number of bathers at the time of its occurrence.

Relief work was undertaken in the stricken areas with promptitude. On the 19th instant the Viceroy appealed for funds to relieve the distressed population and on the 22nd the Governor of Bihar and Orissa also opened a fund for the relief of sufferers from the earthquake at a public meeting in Patna over which he presided. Babu Rajendra Prasad, the Patna Congress leader, had also appealed last week for money as well as materials for relieving the distressed people of Bihar. Prompt and generous public response has been forthcoming from all parts of the country. The Mayor of Bombay and Calcutta called citizens' meetings in both cities and funds have been opened. The havoc caused by the earthquake of January has been as disastrous in Nepal as in Bihar. Two of the daughters of His Majesty the King of Nepal and a grand-daughter of the Prime Minister perished. Old historic monuments have been destroyed and heavy damage has been done to Khatmandu, Patan and Bhaktgaon. Pandit Malaviya has wired to the King of Nepal conveying the sympathy of the Indian people and asking if any help might be rendered from India.

China has also suffered from earthquake shocks of varying intensity during the last week. The last shock was recorded on the 25th instant. An earthquake, lasting two to three minutes, was experienced in the provinces of Shansi and Suiyan. A number of buildings in the Wu-han district in south Suiyan collapsed, and several soldiers and civilians are reported to have been buried under the debris. Four thousand people have been rendered homeless, and hundreds of homes have been damaged by the overflowing of the Yellow River on the borders of the provinces of Honan and Chihli. Three thousand refugees have been rescued from roofs and the tops of trees. Only ten are reported to have been drowned, but a major catastrophe is feared as the river continues to rise.

Pandit Jawaharlal on Women's Education:—In the course of an address to the students of Allahabad Mahila Vidyalyay on January 20th Pandit Jawaharlal said: It is sometimes said, and I believe the Vidyapitha itself lays stress on this, that woman's education should be something apart from that of man's. It should train her for household duties and for the widely-practised profession of marriage. I am afraid I am unable to agree to this limited and one-sided view of woman's education. I am convinced that women should be given the best of education in every department of human activity and be trained to play an effective part in all professions and spheres. In particular, the habit of looking upon marriage as a profession almost and as the sole economic refuge for woman will have to go before woman can have any freedom.

British Schoolboys' Visit:—Twenty British schoolboys arrived in Bombay on the 19th January in connection with the Empire School tour. The purpose of the tour is mainly educational. Mr. H.C.A. Gaunt, Master of Rugby, Director of the tour, said: "We hope to see the Indian people and make friends with them. We have heard of the traditional hospitality of Indians, and want to meet them and exchange ideas."

The Late Lord Halifax:—Death has occurred of the nonagenarian Viscount Halifax, father of Lord Irwin, ex-Viceroy of India. He was a leading layman of the Church of England and he worked side-long for the reunion of the English Church with the Church of Rome.

ASIA'S PLACE IN THE WORLD'S CIVILIZATION—I.

(By JABEZ T. SUNDERLAND.)

What is Asia?

We all know that in area it is the largest continent of the world. It is about twice the size of North America, and about five times that of Europe.

But its size is not its chief importance.

It is not only by far the largest continent and probably the oldest; but in the world's whole career, whole history, it is unquestionably the most important. It has been very fittingly called the World's Mother Continent.

That is a good name. Asia is the mother of most of the world's races (of all the most important); the mother of all the world's most important languages; of all the world's most important religions, including our own. Even those religions that have spread and attained their great careers in other continents—is Mohomedanism in Africa, and Judaism and Christianity in Europe and America—even these had their birth in Asia.

Asia was the creator and therefore the mother of the earliest nations, of most industries, of most of the arts, of nearly all the sciences, of commerce on a large scale, by land and sea, of the world's most important civilizations. Europe is Asia's daughter, America—civilized America—is Europe's daughter, and therefore may very properly be called Asia's grand-daughter.

Let us look a little further at Asia, to see what she has done for civilization—for the world's higher life.

If I were to ask, What is the most important invention in the whole history of man's intellectual life, I would probably be answered, The alphabet. The alphabet came from Asia.

If I were to inquire for the invention second in importance in the whole history of civilization—at least of Western civilization—I should most likely be pointed to the Arabic numerals and the system of decimal notation. These too came from Asia. We call them Arabic numerals; really they are Indian—the Arabs obtained them from India. But whichever country gave them to the world, they came from Asia. To be sure, without an alphabet—a phonetic alphabet—there can be written language, but it is poor, unwieldy, cumbersome, very imperfect. So too, here can be mathematical operations and calculations; but they are very crude and limited. Without these numerals there could be no logarithmic tables; and indeed on these numerals all modern mathematical sciences are based. Nor is this all. Since the physical sciences are based so largely on mathematics, of course the absence of these numerals and the system of notation connected with them, would mean also the impossibility of a large part of our physical sciences.

The foundations of astronomy were laid in Asia.

The mariner's compass, making possible the navigation of wide oceans, came from China.

Gunpowder was invented in some oriental land, probably China.

Printing was an invention of incalculable importance. We generally think of printing with movable type as German in its origin, and we ascribe its invention to Gutenberg. But we now know that the printing was done in China three hundred and fifty years before Gutenberg's day, and in Babylonia earlier still.

What could our modern world do without paper? The world is indebted to China for paper.

China gave us silk and porcelain.

Our popular folk-lore, and our fairy tales told to children in all parts of Christendom, have come in large part from the East, from Arabia, Persia and India.

To Asia, to the Mohammedan people of Asia, we are indebted for such instruments of pleasure and pastime, as chess, checkers and cards.

Ancient Babylonia gave us our week of seven days and our Sabbath, or Sunday, our religious and rest day.

Our moral codes come from Asia—our Ten Commandments from Palestine, back of which and much earlier we find the code of Hammurabi, of Mesopotamia.

The Golden Rule is Asiatic in origin. We get it from Jesus; but other forms of it come from other great religious teachers of Asia earlier in time than Jesus.

I have said that our own religions, Christianity and Judaism, come from Asia. When we are tempted to look down upon Asia and Asiatic peoples, it will do a little to take away our senseless arrogance and our groundless race pride if we call to mind that Moses, Isaiah, David, Solomon and the other great characters of the Old Testament, and Paul and Jesus of the New Testament were Asiatics.

Our Bible comes from Asia. Neither Europe nor America has produced any religion that has endured, nor any sacred book; nor any great religious prophet or teacher that the world places even in the same category with those of Asia.

Until recent time, nearly all the important literatures of the world have been created in Asia. China has a vast literature. Persia has a literature not only extensive but rich in genius. Arabia has a literature hardly less notable.

India, in addition to its extensive and fast-growing modern literature, has a literature in the ancient Sanskrit more extensive than the combined extant literature of Greece and Rome. Embraced in that literature are philosophical works that take rank beside the writings of the greatest philosophers of ancient Greece or modern Germany; epic poems that take their place among the five or six greatest in the world; dramas that are hardly excelled by those of Shakespeare (for example, those of Kalidas), and a vast amount of lyric poetry which ranks among the finest ever written by man. Is there a greater poet in the world to-day than Rabindranath Tagore?

We look down upon China and the Chinese. We find persons on every side who seem to have formed their judgment of the people of China from the laundrymen that we have in our cities. It would be as correct to form our estimate of the people of England from the charwomen or the street-sweepers of London. Not but that our Chinese laundrymen are generally most law-abiding, trustworthy and faithful persons, and worthy of our respect; but we shall do injustice to China if we do not bear in mind that as to education, social standing and culture, these men represent generally not the highest class, or the middle class, but the lowest class of the people.

For many years, large numbers of students have been coming from the Orient, particularly from China, Japan and India, to our western universities for study. How do they compare in intellectual ability, in culture and in moral character with our own students? I have taken pains to make extensive investigations in universities where these Oriental students have been, and are, most numerous; and with hardly an exception I have found the professors who have had most to do with them, testifying unequivocally that, taken as a whole, they are not inferior; that their best men are quite the equals of our best; that their average men are as bright as ours; that as a rule they work harder, and have among them far fewer loafers and shirkers; that in character, culture, refinement and moral qualities they rank well up to our average American standards and are often distinctly their superiors.

At a recent great banquet in the International House, New York, the question arose for discussion and an expression of judgment: Who are the two men to-day most widely known and honoured in all the world? The chairman of the occasion, a professor in Columbia University, expressed the belief that there are two such men; who are they? Are they American? Not many answered, "Yes." Are they Englishmen? Most doubted. Are they French, or German, or Europeans of any nation? Few felt sure that they could answer in the affirmative. When the chairman asked: Are they Tagore, the distinguished poet of India, and Mahatma Gandhi, India's great political leader and saint? the reply in the affirmative was almost unanimous.

What European or what American of our generation ranks higher as a hero, a statesman, and a nation-builder than Sun Yat Sen, the founder of the Chinese Republic? A few years ago, in the last days of the Empire, a great Chinese statesman, Li Hung Chang, had a remarkable career, which attracted the attention of the world. General Grant, in his tour around the world (after the close of his Presidential term), visited China, and was greatly impressed by him. I remember that on General Grant's return to America, he declared in a public statement that, in his judgment, Li Hung Chang was not inferior as a statesman to Gladstone of England or Bismarck of Germany. I remember something still farther back. One of the most eminent and most important early ambassadors, or rather ministers, that the United States ever sent to China, was the Honorable Anson Burlingame. He was there long, and became more thoroughly acquainted with China, and the real Chinese people, and China's civilization, than any one before him had ever done. I recollect that when he came home, he told us, that while we in America had one Ralph Waldo Emerson, China had a thousand.

In China, both the scholar and the magistrate have always ranked socially higher than the soldier, and do so still, except in those circles which have come most under the influence of Europeans. Which shows the higher civilization? Which shows the higher civilization, China or we who place the soldier above the most eminent scholar or educator?

Sir Robert Hart, the distinguished Englishman who for more than forty years was the Inspector General and Director of the Chinese Imperial Customs Service, and who knew China as no Englishman had ever done before, said at the close of his long career there: "The people of China are among the most remarkable in the world. They are intelligent, industrious, economical: they can learn anything and do anything; they are punctiliously polite; they worship talent; they believe in right so firmly that they scorn to think that it does require to be supported or enforced by might; they delight in literature, and everywhere they have their literary clubs and coteries for learning and discussing each other's essays and verses; they possess and practice an admirable system of ethics, and they are generous, charitable, and fond of good works; they never forget a favour, they make rich return for any kindness, and, though they know money will buy service, a man must be more than wealthy to win public esteem and respect; they are practical, teachable, and wonderfully gifted with common sense; they are excellent artisans, reliable workmen, and honest and honorable to a degree that everyone acknowledges and admires in their commercial dealings; and in no other country that is or was has the commandment 'Honor thy father and thy mother' been so religiously obeyed, or so fully and without exception given effect to, as in China."

The educated Chinaman travelling in Europe or America (and the same is true of the educated Hindu) is struck with the crudeness of manners and want of politeness of the people, as compared with the people of his own country. Especially is he impressed with the widespread lack of respect shown by children to parents and by the young to those who are older than themselves.

Turn from China to India. The first time I visited Bombay, I went out a few miles to see the wonderful Elephanta Caves, filled with statues and the most elaborate sculptures, cut out of the solid rocks. I found many of these statues broken and many of the finest carvings defaced in the most deplorable manner, and inquired what was the cause. In reply, I was told that when the Portuguese came to India and took possession of that part of the country, finding that these caves contained statues of Hindu gods, they brought cannon to the entrance and fired in, to destroy the statues, as an expression of their hatred of idolatry. Who showed the higher civilization, the Indian artists who created these fine sculptures, or the Portuguese who in their religious fanaticism and vandalism sought to destroy them? Lord Curzon, a Viceroy of India, took occasion several times during his Viceregal term and later to tell the English people that they are quite mistaken if ever they think of India otherwise than as a land of high and ancient civilization and culture, and to remind them that the Indian people had given to the world profound philosophies and noble literature and art while yet the inhabitants of the British islands were half-naked savages running wild in the woods.

THE MIDDLE CLASSES HEAVY DEBTS.

(By Ossa.)

Why not a Civic Bank to alleviate the financial distress of the middle classes, run on lines similar to those on which Rural Banks are run for the benefit of the ryots? Most efforts to assist the indebted concentrate on the rural areas; in India this is natural, perhaps inevitable, for the peasantry form a very big majority of the population and are, generally speaking, the most heavily in debt in proportion to their resources. Hence the many and far from unsuccessful efforts, both private and Governmental, to alleviate rural distress by means of Co-operative Societies, Banks, and similar institutions, which lend out sums varying from twenty to twenty thousand rupees at low interest (about 8% today) for long periods on the security of land, buildings, implements, livestock and crops. No one would wish this indispensable work to abate by one jot of energy of capital; the wealthier and the healthier our peasantry the sounder and more prosperous our national and economic life. But need the relief of indebtedness be confined, as it is today, almost entirely to the farmer and the ryot? The middle classes—the physicians, surgeons, civil and military officers, lawyers, clerics, and others—need relief just as much as the peasants and are seldom able to find it. Yet there is no solid reason why this state of affairs should exist; it is not peculiar to India, for middle class debts are as common in Europe and America.

as here; and I have a few suggestions to make which may serve as food for thought, even if not providing a final remedy.

Any banker will tell you that one of today's chief problems is not a shortage of money but a lack of investments to put it in. Any investment promising more than bank interest which comes along is snapped up and the success of the recent Mysore State 3½% loan is proof of this, if proof is needed. Five years ago the investing public expected at least 6% on their money; today they are happy to get 3½% and the majority of them bemoan the fact that no good investments exist for their capital. In fact India today possesses an enormous amount of capital which is either lying idle or is earning little or nothing in fixed deposit accounts. A big loan giving 7% interest would be over-subscribed a dozen times; but no Government or State would be so foolish as to float one, since it can without difficulty borrow a crore of rupees at half that amount. What is to be done with India's surplus capital? I suggest that it should be lent to the middle classes at a moderate rate of interest, which procedure, I hold, would bring in its train benefits to the community at large unrealized by the majority.

An investigation of the books of all our leading shops and merchants would reveal scores of overdue accounts, amounting all told to hundreds of lakhs of rupees. And the debtors are mainly to be found among the middle classes which, in proportion to their incomes, pay the highest taxes, receive the least return for their money, and are compelled by society to keep the highest standard of living. These middle classes are not the breeding-ground of constitutional "bilkers"; they are composed mainly of those professional and Service men who try, year in and year out, to keep their heads and their families' heads above water, normally on incomes which, whatever world prices, vary little and in times of depression are curtailed by cuts and decimated by the demands made by the privations of others. It is on the donations, support, and taxes of these middle classes that our social and public services, our hospitals and societies for rescue and prevention work, depend. Moreover, it is their contributions and charity which enable a whole host of poorer relations and friends to survive the hardships and to pay the rent and doctors' bills of these terrible days. The peasantry may be the backbone of the nation, but the middle classes are its nervous system and its brain, at least in an age which has seen the disappearance of the purely agricultural State. And the middle classes are more heavily and more unhappily in debt than John Citizen, preoccupied with his personal and domestic worries, realizes. Further, they form a group which it is difficult to reach by Governmental means.

The middle classes need help; the holders of capital need investments; and I suggest that the latter should invest in the former. The investor will immediately object that as a rule the middle classes hold insufficient security to cover his loan in the event of default, whereas the agriculturist does at any rate possess land. The reasoning is not so sound as it appears: in these depressed days which is the better proposition, a loan of ten thousand rupees for 15 years at 8½% on the security of land which, should the borrower default, may find no purchaser, or a loan of the same amount for seven years at 7% to a Service man receiving a salary of Rs. 1000 a month to whom default means a scandal possibly ending his career?

The latter, too, can almost always offer the assignment of a life insurance policy as a guarantee to the lender in case death should cut payments short. To take a typical case (the writer knows many such): A is an official earning Rs. 1000 a month; he owes Rs 5000 accumulated debts, often unavoidable, of the past several years; if B, the investor, will lend him the amount, he is prepared to pay back Rs 200 a month at 7% interest per annum. The advantages of such a transaction are manifold; the entire debt is repaid in under 2½ years; B has received far higher interest than he would receive elsewhere in an ordinary investment which compensates him adequately for the rather greater risk involved, and he is protected by A's assigned life (or endowment) policy in case the latter unexpectedly dies. On A's side he has wiped out all the debts which, carrying with them a constant fear of possible Court actions, have been for years a source of worry and have thereby reduced his efficiency both as citizen and as official. Moreover, the tradesmen and merchants who were A's creditors have received new life blood and have reduced their own interest charges with their banks. Money which had been doing no good or had been earning B a nominal interest has quickened the economic and financial pulse of A's and B's neighbourhood all round.

It is ironical that a man in A's position can borrow money without much difficulty at reasonable interest in order to create new debts! If he wants to buy a new car, A can borrow from an insurance society the sum involved, pay for the car, and repay the society in monthly instalments spread over two or three years, but he cannot do so in order to settle old debts; and settlement of old debts is at least as important to prosperity and progress as the creation of new. In parenthesis, one reason for the greater facility with which money can be borrowed for the purchase of the new, as opposed to payment for the old, is that in the former case the lender has the assurance—for what it is worth—that the borrower has in his possession an object (the new purchase) which forms in itself fairly good security for his loan. But if A is in debt his sole hope at present, in the absence of considerable real property, is to borrow from a firm of money-lenders, whose interest charges are generally so high as eventually to put A in a worse position than he was before. It is ironical again that a company which finds itself in difficulties can file a petition of bankruptcy without any stigma worth talking about attaching itself in society's eyes to the individuals who composed the company, whereas bankruptcy in most cases means the social and professional ruin of the lawyer, civilian, or soldier.

The real difficulty in the way of the middle class borrower is always one of security, but this, in my view, is not insuperable. It is, at any rate today, generally easier to raise immediate money by auctioning moveable property—cars, household effects, and the like—than by selling land and houses; and the type of solid middle class man I have in mind usually possesses at least ten thousand rupees worth of personal property and has more often than not taken out a life or endowment insurance policy. Moreover it would be comparatively easier for a society formed to aid middle class debtors to ascertain the soundness or otherwise of, say, a surgeon or Indian Civilian than of a ryot whose debts may go back to the time of his great-grand-fathers. Such organized relief for the middle classes is essentially work for private persons with capital to invest; it cannot be done by public or Governmental enterprise; and bankers and others with whom I have discussed the ideas very roughly outlined in this article are agreed that they are neither impracticable nor objectionable, while the relief of middle class debts by loans at reasonable interest would bring in its train benefits not only to the borrower but, as I have pointed out, to the community at large, and such benefits far outweigh whatever risks may be attached to loans not based on real property. Defaults are likely to be rare, because repayment of such loans as I suggest would be fairly easy and also because the middle classes are worked upon by a psychological and social compulsion against default which is stronger than in other classes. Many a member of the middle classes has gone from youth to death in debt and the worry caused by debt because he could not afford the money-lender's exorbitant interest who, helped as I suggest, would have been happier, more prosperous, and of definitely greater value as a citizen.

PROSPECTS OF SOCIAL REFORM.*

(By G. K. DEVADHAR, M.A., C.L.E.)

Social Reform so far in this country had naturally to direct its attack against the citadel of orthodoxy and conservatism in which all reactionary and on-sided factors of the so-called national advance remained perched but now in my opinion, the time has arrived when social reform could be freed from that narrow rut and placed on a wider and more constructive and less critical plane of social reconstruction in which several have been labouring without much moral support from the politicians. But luckily the spirit of the age and the shrinking of distances have caused even involuntary change of heart and outlook, which would facilitate the work of amelioration of the Society as a whole. In the past it was quite necessary to deal with the elementary problems of social reform such as sea-voyage, women's education, abolition of caste, stopping of infant marriages, promotion of widow remarriages, and of post-puberty marriages, and furthering the age of consent, inter-dining and even intermarriages, etc.

The bogey of untouchability and unapproachability still haunts us, but its days are numbered as its foundations are unmistakably shaken by the most powerful influence of Mahatma Gandhi whose work in this connection, I have always likened, to that of a powerful and tremendous blast.

While, therefore, not neglecting work in these abovementioned directions, we must now begin to concentrate our attention on problems that embrace wider fields and touch the bottom and the top of society. The justification for such widening of the outlook of Social Reform work lies clearly in the imperative necessity of flowing with the world currents of the rapidly advancing tide of what we call civilization. India fortunately has not lagged much behind though the inevitable need for social reform is recognized by only the so-called educated few—using the phrase in its widest sense; it is a matter of no small surprise, however, that even after a century and a half of the spread of English education and contact with Western Culture, improvement in evil customs and demoralizing superstitions has not yet taken place on a wider basis, and advanced view or higher thought in social life is today possibly, the luxury of the comparatively small number of those who crowd into big cities and towns where reformed life has its attendant evils as well.

We are all increasingly anxious now to lead a higher, purer, and truly nobler national life, in keeping with the changing ideals of higher social being so as to secure the advance of our society along lines of advance of the whole human race or humanity. In our search for truth of the science of human society we may in vain expect today, at any rate, any guidance to lead us safely to the goal, because among the many seekers after scientific truth and foundation for the human society there has not yet been reached any unanimity of basic principles that ought to regulate the conduct of human beings that constitute society as we see it developing today. Science has very miserably failed in this direction of supplying the much needed guidance, though its vast, wonderful, and epoch-making achievements have surpassed the imagination of even those toiling long in the field with great faith and expectations.

If we go on worrying ourselves with the result of the so-called scientific research in the sphere of human society and wait till the guidance is forthcoming we may have to wait till Doomsday. We must, therefore, prepare for our onward march by taking stock of the progress which society has made so long with the help of historical records in various countries and in different times with special reference to the history and institutions of our race; we would be securing sufficient data for us to proceed in that way. Most of our trouble is due to the confusion caused by the mingling of the little spheres of religion and Hindu social polity and political public policy. If we could only avoid this confusion much trouble could be saved. We must bring our work, our social reform work, in line with the other national activities each one working in its own sphere or domain. Politics up till now has attracted the largest attention because thereby is afforded a common platform and differences with regard to religious or communal interests are reduced to the lowest minimum.

Thus, the arena of the politics is more attractive to those who wish to carry on their public activity along more constructive lines, and be least critical. Now we shall have to examine whether the work of fighting, on destructive lines, so heroically done by the early venerable pioneers in this field is not sufficient and whether the time has not come to interpret now, the correct scope or sphere of social reform in the terms of the changing conditions of the world which are sooner or later bound to affect us. This will establish the necessity for our familiarity with the culture and science, of the Western Christianity; it will also establish a clear necessity for living contact with life under modern conditions in the New Far East countries as well.

The country has been making experiments along social lines, and she will have to continue doing so for many years to come. Change is an inevitable social factor, and reform is its necessary concomitant. I have not, therefore, ruled out of court consideration of many of the modern problems—in fact I would be myself touching on some of them briefly, making here and there my own independent contribution. But the reason why I defer that treatment to a later stage is due to my desire to emphasise the need for changed outlook on problems of social reform of to-day and distinguish them from those of yesterday that still loom large, and to define what constitutes the sheet anchor of social amelioration.

Now I shall deal with some of them very briefly alluding to several of the special features of development that need emphasis. Take the women's problem. Women of to-day have learnt to organise, to educate public opinion with regard to their needs and have a regular net-work of their organisations all over the country. They have all along supported men in their advocacy for a wider franchise and some of them have also emerged out of their seclusion or purdah in a few places only to participate actively in the struggle for freedom. But I would like to see them engaged in common with men in day to day spade work for the general amelioration of their sex to entitle them to secure the fullest possible measure of freedom and liberty from men who have also to learn to trust women as their equal partners in national and social uplift. Active participation in public life should not be a mere matter of momentary sentimental enthusiasm. They should not commit the mistake of devoting all their energies to some of the barren fields of politics but should take upon their shoulders sufficient responsibility of sharing men's national work in the spheres of education of the masses, social reform for their advancement and the economic and other improvements of the rural parts of our country. I am glad to notice that some of these ideas have found favour with the women of India that met in a conference in Calcutta on the 27th of December. While proclaiming their readiness to enjoy adult franchise, they claimed greater attention to widening their rights and privileges in respect of inheritance and widening of their franchise, the necessity for building an army of whole-timed workers for carrying on social reform activity, and the need for effective propaganda with the judicious and wise use of the cinema and vocational education.

The communities formed into caste and religious and racial groups—the so-called caste groups—are in my opinion, one of the most practical problems for solution before our country. It must be both the creation and restoration of harmonious relationships, among members of various communities. So long as we have not learnt to trust each other and allow ourselves to be guided by the narrow interests of our groups, all will suffer because the rest of the world has no concern whatsoever with our local differences which we have not yet learnt to adjust ourselves, and intervention with which on the part of outsiders would be a clear indication of our unfitness to rule ourselves. They have disintegrated completely our Society, to which process momentum has been added by the preponderance of the widely different creeds, in our social polity. The only solvent of this situation is to learn to look upon ourselves, as our master the late Mr. Gokhale used to say, as Indians first and Moslems, Hindus, Christians, Jains, Parsis, afterwards. Some classes have to make a beginning to adjust their life along these lines, and it must be seen how consideration of larger self will propel some of them to practise these principles in life and realise the true unity of the society.

The third large question which should attract our attention is the position in the midst of our so-called depressed and suppressed brethren numbering between 40 to 50 millions. Mahatmaj has done the greatest service to this class directly and to the Hindus indirectly by sponsoring their cause, and offering even to fight, at the cost of great popularity, the stubborn attitude of the conservatives who are very vocal and loud in their denunciation of the political disabilities under which they labour in their own country and outside, but which can scarcely bear any comparison with the existing disabilities to which this vast mass of human being, is unwittingly subjected, let us say, by the rest of the Hindu community. It is, therefore, the duty of the Hindus, as also of those in whose power it lies, to improve their lot in most constructive ways, though such improvement is an equal necessity of the vast majority, in common with them, of the community at large. But their need has been rendered greater and more urgent by the fact of their being ruthlessly subjected to untouchability for generations past in the name of religion, contrary to the spirit of humanity, by our orthodox brethren. Untouchability which is universally condemned by all thinking sections as the darkest spot on the fair face of exalted Hinduism is doomed for ever. But our business as social reformers is to see that no wrong emphasis is put by any of the parties immediately concerned on any wrong principles, and true constructive work is taken up as a lever to lift them up with special reference to the eradication of untouchability and unapproachability. Here in Southern India in some parts, some roads around some shrines are barred against these human beings whereas they are open for dogs and donkeys to tread upon. Some of us are very keen on their social and economic uplift and that is why we have to-day in India more than 200 centres of active work started in the name of the Servants of the Untouchables Society now which has been again changed to Harijan Seva Sangh. Temple entry and legislation thereabout are bones of contention, more so because, the depressed classes have not shown much active enthusiasm for temple entry for the satisfaction of their truly religious cravings, while others who advocate it, in spite of this indifference of the community in some places, are directly concerned to do so, because in this sphere of social reform they do not like to be accused of allowing a weak point in the Hindu social polity to remain "an inferiority complex."

Cannot India do some thing under the new Reforms by state legislation? While on this topic, I would like in passing to refer to the furious controversy that raged round the question whether social reform should be pushed on, in spite of people's wishes, with the help of legislation. But that controversy is buried now. It had poignancy when the spirit of the administration and controlling forces were mostly moulded by foreign spirit and outside considerations, but now all our Provincial legislative Councils and the Central Legislature are mainly Indian, composed of the representatives of the people and many Provinces, like C.P., U.P., Bombay, Madras, and the Punjab, have lost no time in introducing useful pieces of legislation for the improvement of the general masses of the people in social, economic, and international spheres. Moreover, it is further very refreshing and re-assuring to note that many of the leading Indian States have utilised their legislative machinery and their peculiar position of independence in getting social legislation enacted in many matters of domestic social reform. In this connection I would mention the names of Baroda, Mysore, Travancore, Indore, Cochin, Kashmir and Hyderabad (Deccan) and other small states. But it is very interesting to note in this connection that the British Government who were in the earlier days of their rule very keen or in any case friendly to the introduction of social legislation have changed that attitude now. Their present attitude in this behalf seems to many of their admirers and friends as extremely halting if not quite hostile, and some of us would like the central legislature to be much bolder and imaginative in this behalf as they would be pushing on the cause of general upliftment of the vast masses of this country. One of the grounds in support of such an attitude being that Society is advancing, and it would not carry out its functions vigorously with the old worn-out institutions which may have justification in their own days.

Another most important sphere in which a colossal amount of work lies ahead of us, I mean in the direction of the improvement of conditions of life in rural parts. It is a pity that the vastness of the subject and its many sided solutions would require more detailed treatment. Another greater and more urgent need of the people residing in rural parts is public health, and the many problems affecting this vast question, which need immediate attention such as, village sanitation, personal and public hygiene, food reform, so as to secure the best results with the least expenditure as is at present being experimented by some of my colleagues in Bombay in the work of the Bombay Presidency Baby and Health Week Association. Lastly, the new question which has begun to attract attention on the part of the intelligent public as a result of some of the figures published in the recent census report by Dr. Hutton, the Census Commissioner of India. Birth Control has offered a suggestion as one of the tried and possible practical remedies to combat the enormous rate of increase in the population of the whole country. We know our population has grown in the past ten years by nearly four crores but to give you a much clearer idea of this enormous growth I can cite figures from Travancore State where the population has risen to 51 lakhs from 41 lakhs ten years ago, thus showing an increase of ten lakhs during the past decade, and in this increase of ten lakhs five lakhs, 50 per cent of the growth is supplied by one community, the Christian alone. Indian's solution of the problem of birth control, will be determined ultimately by the view she is compelled to take of the unit of a family, whether it is a social or a spiritual unit or it has only an economic character and relationship. I am interested to find that, in your province barring a few small religious communities, a great deal of public opinion is educated in its favour, and some women's conference in Berars held recently adopted a resolution in support of birth-control clinics. Women have even begun to express their opinion emphatically on the need for divorce being sanctioned by legislation.

An important problem, to the solution of which some of the vested interests of the country will have to bring to bear all powers of imagination and larger human interests, and of industrial welfare, is the problem of labour. Those who need the employment of labour in their industrial pursuits must treat them with better consideration than they show to their tools. While dealing with labour, the Central Government will have to recognize some of its special responsibilities which it cannot easily leave to provincial governments. Several international conventions, having a more intimate bearing on the daily life of the people engaged in industrial production in British as well as in Indian India have to be given effect to and it falls within the purview of the Central Government, and also when it assumes a Federal character, to see that they are put into practice.

In considering problems dealing with the improvement of rural classes we cannot afford to pass over the need of the problem of temperance and discouragement of the habit of drink among them and the avoidance of unnecessary and wasteful litigation. I am told that litigation and drink have absorbed between them both a sum of not less than 100 crores of rupees a year to err on the safer side, though it is reported that some Committee which sat to consider the question of prohibition estimated the total expenditure in India on intoxicants alone to the extent of 100 crores. The rejection of Prohibition by U. S. A. and the comparative failure of local option in this Presidency need not dispirit us. Our efforts at organising temperance leagues and Village Panchayats of settlement of disputes must go on in faith, and a regular net-work of such institutions should be undertaken as is done in the case of temperance by the United Provinces.

I have enumerated in their general aspects some of the outstanding problems of social reform before the country, but have not dealt with my own views with regard to the method to be adopted for their solution. When a social reform ceases to be fighting in its attitude and lays considerable stress on its constructive side, considering the urgency for work in different fields it naturally assumes the character of social service which must be and should be rendered by as large a number of Indian men and women as the magnitude of the problem demands. This in brief, in my opinion, is the case for Indianisation of social service. To complete our just demands from the political platform for Indianization of civil services and Indianization of military services, we must also be ready to take up the responsibility of Indianising, without detriment to the work of other friends from foreign lands, in this sphere of social and educational reform. What is needed now is immediate action for which the country must supply a very large army of patriotic young men with missionary zeal for this great task before the nation. If a well thought out and defined programme of social uplift is to be worked out seriously then there is need for those who feel the urge to come forth and husband all their resources. It is a matter in which Government and the people should work conjointly securing help from every available source.

THE BARROWS LECTURES.

"RELIGION CANNOT BE SHUT OUT."

"You can no more shut religion out of human life than you can shut out food." "Many of our superstitions are based on the fear of happiness."

These were some of the characteristic sentences which formed part of the first lecture in the Eighth Series of the Barrows Lectures, 1933-34, delivered by Dr. Shailer Mathews of Chicago University in the Wilson College Hall, Bombay, on Saturday.

The subject of the evening was "Religion as a form of Human Behaviour." Prof. P. A. Wadia who presided, in introducing the lecturer to the large audience, said that the substance of Dr. Mathews' lectures was a message of peace and goodwill in which the world was interested to-day.

Dr. Mathews at the outset pointed out that at the time of his appointment as the Barrows lecturer, Mr. K. Natarajan was in America delivering a series of lectures. This interplay of thought between the two countries was intended to bring about a better understanding. He added: "I have not come to India as a member of any commission, and I am not going to write a book on India when I get back."

The purpose of these lectures, the speaker said, was not an apologia but a historical and sociological study of the moral and religious aspect of western civilization, with the hope that it might suggest a method for meeting the moral crisis in the modern social trend.

Human history was a series of connected experiences of people passing down their civilization in a continuous stream of life. A religion which originated in a certain civilization always carried with it the qualities of that civilization where it was formed.

All religions were of a social origin, and the principles of human life, therefore, were dramatised in some form of social technique. It was not possible to know everything about a religion by a mere study of its literature. It was not possible, for instance, to know all about the Christian movement by a study of the New Testament.

There were two distinct classes of followers of any religion; those who behaved in a manner dictated by their religion, and another, intellectual class, whose vision could pierce through religion and see its universal aspect.

Dealing with the conception of God, the lecturer said that people conceived God as the personification of a force on which they depended to direct their actions according to their needs. A shepherd, for instance, imagined God as an ideal shepherd who directed herds of sheep. The general conception of God was as the supreme sovereign over the whole world and the universe.

Dr. Mathews called attention to the fact that Christianity was a social movement as well as religious, though it carried itself on ideals and techniques. Technique, whether in thought or practice, was derived from social relationships in which the followers of a religion participated.

Man was something like a machine which could not direct itself, but which required a force behind it. Similarly, human affairs required the sanction of religion to direct them along proper channels and to avoid moral confusion.

RISE OF CHRISTIANITY.

An appeal to Hindus to study closely their religion in order to see whether it had in any way governed their social customs, was voiced by Dr. Mathews in delivering the second lecture of the Eighth Series of Barrows Lectures in the Wilson College Hall, Bombay, on Monday evening. Sir Stanley Reed presided. In the course of a comprehensive survey of Christianity as an aspect of Western civilization, Dr. Mathews declared that Christianity did not organise or give direction to the forces making for social changes, but impregnated these social forces with the ideals that formed the very heart of the movement itself.

Opening his address, the lecturer said that it was first of all necessary for the historian to recognise the fact that Christianity was a religious-social movement and not a philosophy; it was not identical with the teachings of Jesus, although he was the centre of the movement.

Christianity began with the Jews ascribing to it all the qualities of the Messianic hope. This hope was really a national hope for deliverance from the nation that then held the Jewish race in subjection.

Tracing the historical background of the movement, the lecturer said that at the time of its formation the Romans who were in control of Jewish affairs, were instituting an era of peace and prosperity. But with increasing internal peace and prosperity an idea gradually arose among the people that the king of the Jews would be a descendant of the house of David, and that the world would also be ruled by a descendant of the same house.

One section, the zealots, believed in Jesus as a Messiah. The disciples desired Jesus to bring about a Messianic kingdom, but Jesus pointed out to them the futility of attempting to establish a kingdom by violence. For if a divine kingdom was to be established, it must be by way of the King, the Heavenly Father, and His way was the way of love.

The disciples at first did not understand the principles expounded by Jesus, but they called him Christ. After his death they looked forward to his return to establish a kingdom by violence. This was far from the idea of Jesus, who died rather than submit to that method of establishing a kingdom.

The Messianic hope was an expression of the sublimation of nationalism. By the end of the first century, Jesus was no longer a national hero and the Jews had repudiated him. But the Gentiles accepted him as the Saviour. Later the Gentiles altered his teachings into a philosophy, attaching to it their own social experiences.

The lecturer discussed the rise of mystery religions in the Greco-Roman world, which were all subject to the ways in which men thought they could be saved from death. These peoples instilled their conceptions into Christianity, and in this way the sacramental and priestly elements were brought into the movement. But still the basic centre of Christianity was Jesus; neither a philosophy nor a moral code.

The lecturer then dealt with the growth of the church as a social institution, and explained how the doctrine protected the solidarity of the Christian bodies during the Reformation, which was really the setting-up of Churches outside the Roman Empire.

ANALOGIES FROM SOCIAL EXPERIENCE.

In his third lecture, delivered on Tuesday evening, at the Wilson College, Dr. Mathews, this year's Barrows lecturer, spoke on "The Moral Nature of the Christian Religion." Mr. Justice Barlee presided.

Dealing first of all with the theological superstructure of Christianity he showed how it was built up in accordance with analogies taken from social experience. Theology is a formulated system of relations which are believed to exist between man and God. The vocabulary of this theology is largely derived by analogy from judicial and political experience.

For example, the Christian doctrine of the Trinity was explained by Tertullian by analogy with the Roman legal custom whereby one man might appear as more than one "persona," according to the different legal aspects in which he was involved.

So too, when the Roman Empire was at its height, Augustine in his "City of God" developed the idea of the sovereignty of God in the pattern of the Roman Emperor. This conception was retained through the Holy Roman Empire, with the difference that God now ruled through two viceregents, the Pope and the Emperor.

With the use of Feudalism there was a further differentiation. The idea of the dignity and honour of superiors in rank was brought into the concept, and Anselm, the leader of scholasticism in the 11th century, wrote his famous book a Christian apology addressed to cultured non-Christians, to justify the Incarnation without using the authority of scripture. He did so by analogy from the feudal system. The incarnation, he said, was to render satisfaction to the dignity of the Divine Lord wounded by man's rebellion—a satisfaction which man by himself was unable to make. So arose the "satisfaction" theory of the death of Christ, which is still set forth in Christian doctrinal documents.

Later in the west feudalism passed into nationalism centred round an absolute monarch, and to this pattern Calvin shaped his doctrine of an Absolute God, who passed decrees about which his people had no right to reason, and who chose in an arbitrary way the elect and condemned the others.

But the lecturer went on to say, through all these differentiations in doctrine the basic values of Christianity were carried on. These basic values all have a moral nature. They assert that the universe is not merely mechanistic, but is instinct with personality-producing activities; that these activities culminate in love, that is, the co-ordinating process of the universe on the level of personality; that when man tries to act in accordance with this he always finds God's help; and finally that death does not check the further development of personality.

The attitudes of Christianity are moral, the way of the Christian life is the way of love, but the technique of love should be guided by the knowledge of science.—The Times of India.

TRAVEL BY AIR.

Addressing a meeting of the members of the Rotary Club of Bombay at the Taj Mahal Hotel on Tuesday January 22, Sir Phiroze Sethna visualised the possibility, at no distant time, of flight by air from Bombay to London during a week-end or a little over. The subject of the address was "My Flight to Europe and Back."

Sir Phiroze observed that in 1933 he had to go to Europe twice as a British Indian delegate to the Joint Parliamentary Committee on Indian affairs. The first time, he went by steamer to Marseilles and from there flew to London the same day. The whole journey from Bombay to London was therefore accomplished in a little over 11 days.

During his stay in England, he had to go twice to Geneva and back. On both the occasions he did so by air. When the Joint Parliamentary Committee rose for the recess in August last, he came back to Bombay by steamer. His stay in India was limited only to three weeks. He decided to return to Europe by air so that he might have three or four more days in India.

He went by train from Bombay to Karachi and thence left by the Imperial Airways plane HANNO on Wednesday, September 20, at 9-50 a.m. and reached Croydon on the following Monday at 11 a.m. If the difference in time were allowed for it would be seen that the flight took just 5½ days from Karachi. On the return trip, he left Croydon on Saturday, November 25, at 12-30 p.m. and reached Juhu (Bombay) on the Saturday following.

One could now fly from India to Europe by three different air lines, namely the Imperial Airways, the K. L. M. which was a Dutch line, and by the French line. The K. L. M. machines carried only four passengers each. The French perhaps carried some more. The Imperial Airways machine could carry 24 passengers.

At present there was no night flying, but it was under contemplation, and when it was begun, it would be possible for letters posted in London to be delivered in India on the fourth day. The seating accommodation in aeroplanes by the Imperial Airways was comfortable and passengers could read, write, or sleep in the air during the day.

Wherever there was arrangement for supplying meals on land, passengers were so served; otherwise they were provided in the plane itself on small folding tables opening up in front of the seats. The menu served in the plane for a breakfast consisted of grape fruit, bologne sausage, scrambled eggs, marmalade, bread, butter, and coffee.

In between meals in the plane, passengers were served bovril, biscuits, and coffee or fruit, if desired. In the evenings, they came down so that dinner and sleeping accommodation were provided, whether at first class hotels, where available, or in specially built rest houses of the company, which were fairly up to date.

Formerly the noise of the engine was so great that one could hardly speak to one's neighbour and because of the noise passengers had to plug their ears with cotton wool to prevent slight deafness on landing. This is not the case in the new machines, where one could talk without having to raise one's voice.

The speed was never less than 80 miles an hour, but generally about 100 and with a favourable wind, even 120 miles an hour. Land planes to avoid clouds or winds, as the case might be, went up high and the highest he flew while going from India, said the speaker, was 9,000 ft. at one time over the desert. No smoking was allowed at any time when flying.

Travelling by air was certainly costlier than by sea or land at present for long distances. One had to pay anything from 25 to 40 per cent. more. Whilst the fares for long distances by air were stationary and uniform throughout the year, those by ships varied with the season and also with the kind of accommodation provided, according to the deck or cabin.

In the planes all seats were alike and a single fare from Karachi to Croydon was £95, and a 10 per cent. discount was allowed on a return ticket. The fare from Bombay to Karachi and Karachi to Bombay was extra. The fares by air for short distances in Europe were about the same as by rail or ship, if not even lower during some seasons of the year.

For the long distance flights there was a combine between the three companies coming out East in regard to the rates for passage money and freight. A passenger was allowed 221 lbs. between himself and his luggage. It was estimated that the average weight of a passenger was 166 lbs, which would leave 55 lbs. for luggage to be carried free.

The heaviest man carried by the Indian National Airways weighed 287 lbs. Any excess over 221 lbs. had to be paid for at the rate of about Rs. 8-4-0 per lb. from Croydon to Karachi. When the company allowed just 221 lbs. between one's weight and one's luggage, a wag who turned the scale at 220 lbs. observed that the only luggage he could carry free would be a tooth brush. The rule had been altered recently, and a passenger was now allowed luggage free up to 83 lbs.

There was no question, continued Sir Phiroze, that travelling by air was becoming increasingly popular. During the official year ended March 31, 1932, as many as 1,241 persons availed themselves of this mode of transit between India and England bothways. In the succeeding 12 months, the number rose to 2,494 which was an increase by 101 per cent.

In every single flight, he saw women travelling young and old and even with infants in arms. That showed how people were becoming more air-minded day by day. It could not be denied there had been accidents. Have there not been also railway smashes? The aeroplanes do not mind storms or gales so much as the ships do, but the one enemy it has not yet completely conquered was the fog.

Aeroplanes afford the same facilities as a train with the added advantage of saving in time. Everything was done for the passengers and they would be as cool and as fresh when they alighted as when they started. Less people were air sick than sea sick.

Apples from Japan:—Japan is now exporting apples to India. Bombay has imported more than fifty thousand of these apples during the last five weeks. The first consignments were received in the beginning of 1933, as an experimental measure, but before the season was out, fifty thousand cases containing five million apples, had been landed in Bombay. And this in spite of the fact that the duty was levied on the tariff value and not the invoice value.

Mr. Subash Bose on Fascism:—A Reuter's message from Milan says: "Through the initiative of Mr. Subash Bose, an Association of Indian students has been formed here. Welcoming the new Association at the inaugural gathering, Senator Fantole said that the advent of Indian students in Milan for the polytechnic was the beginning of a greater relationship between West and the East. Mr. Bose, lecturing on India and Italy, expressed admiration for Italy and Fascism and said that he considered Signor Mussolini the greatest man of the epoch."

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Race for Government Posts:—The results of the competitive examination held by the Public Service Commission for filling appointments in the Ministerial Service (First and Second Division) of the Government of India Secretariat have been announced. There were 1,069 candidates, who sat for the examination. Among the first twenty in order of merit, there are nineteen Hindus, and one Muslim. Out of the 19 Hindus, 15 are Madrasis, two Bengalis, one from Sind and one from the C. P.

Mahasabha and the League:—If it is understood that the Hindu Mahasabha is shortly sending a reply to the League of Nations' letter in regard to the communal settlement and that the draft is almost ready. The outlines of the draft, it is understood, are that the Mahasabha recognises that the League has no authority to force its resolution on member States but that it has moral force! India is one of the original members of the League and is a signatory to the resolution on minority treatment which was re-affirmed in 1928 with the consent of India. The draft then points out how the minority resolution has been violated by the Communal Award in India and suggests ways and means of discussing the subject at a meeting of the League. The Mahasabha hopes that the League would not obstruct its discussion. Lastly, the draft suggests discussion of the whole question informally and unofficially with a delegation of the Mahasabha during the next summer.

Delhi Discovery:—The long-lost site of the Hall of a Thousand Pillars (Kasr-i-hazar Satun), one of the glories of mediaeval Delhi, has been located among the ruins of Siri, the second of the Seven Cities, a quarter of a mile off the Qutub Road, writes the "Statesman" correspondent. The discovery was made by Khan Bahadur Maulvi Zafar Hasan, Deputy Director of the Archaeological Survey of India, whose opinion was confirmed by a party of professors from Aligarh University when they recently inspected the ruined buildings of the Khilji and Tughlak dynasties. The Hall of a Thousand Pillars is mentioned in historical documents, but passing centuries have played such havoc with the City of Siri that its site was forgotten. Siri was founded in 1803 by Alauddin Khilji, the most remarkable monarch of his dynasty, to give greater protection to the older city clustering round the Qutub Minar.

Chittagong Magistrate's Notification:—The District Magistrate has issued an order directing all Hindu "bhadralok" men in eight thanas adjoining Kotwali Chittagong, upto the age of twenty-five, to remain indoors for one week. Another order prohibits (a) for 48 hours the running of trains on the main line to and from Chittagong with the exception of the Calcutta Mail and the Assam Mail. These trains are not to stop at any place within the district to pick up or set down passengers except at Chittagong; (b) prohibits for forty-eight hours on the Chittagong-Nazirhat line, trains except the No. 47 Up and No. 42 Down, from stopping at any place between Chittagong and Hathazari; (c) prohibits for forty-eight hours on the Chittagong-Dobazari line the running of trains except the No. 55 Up and the No. 52 Down from stopping anywhere between Patiya and Chittagong. A third order prohibits for forty-eight hours Barisal and Cox's Bazar steamers from taking up or setting down passengers until they have passed the outer-bar at the Chittagong Port entrance. A fourth order prohibits for forty eight hours the plying of passenger launches on the Karnafuli river. A fifth order directs all courts and offices under the control of the District Magistrate, Chittagong, to be closed for forty-eight hours. A sixth order prohibits for forty-eight hours motor traffic beyond the Jularhat-Chittagong-Dacca Road, and the Sholasahar crossing on the Chittagong-Hathazari Road. The orders are enforced from the 18th instant.

NOTES

The Barrows Lectures:—The Barrows Lectures were delivered in Bombay commencing from the 20th January by Dr. Shailer Mathews, an eminent leader of contemporary religious thought in America. Excellent summaries of the lectures were published by the Times of India alone among the Bombay daily newspapers. Three of these were reprinted in the Reformer last week and we reprint the remaining three in this issue. They are distinguished by their independent and courageous attempt to disentangle the purely social elements in modern Christianity. Dr. Mathews suggested that similar attempts should be made to separate the non-essentials from essentials in Hinduism and other religions. If this is done, it will be seen that the core of all great religions is much the same and the greatest dividing influence among human beings will be converted into a potent harmonising force among nations. Dr. Mathews' handling of his thesis was masterly. It is a great pity that the lectures did not attract larger audiences and that Principal John MacKenzie who presided at the last lecture felt obliged to apologise to Dr. Mathews on this account. It is not altogether the fault of the public. In the early years, there used to be formed a citizens' committee which was very useful in getting the Barrows lecturer in touch with local culture. For some reason, this practice has been lost sight of. We should like it to be revived so that the benefit of these lectures which are always of abiding interest to Indians may be extended, as they are delivered, to the largest number of citizens. Dr. Mathews and his wife during their short visit were nevertheless able to see something of Indian life and they carry with them the respect and goodwill of all those who were privileged to meet them.

A Unique Institution:—Twenty-three girls from the Arya Kanya Pathshala of Baroda left last week for East Africa on an educational tour. The expenses of the tour are being borne by a wealthy Hindu merchant. The girls are under 16 years of age. They look smart in their dark short trousers and a white shirt open at the throat, which evoked an appreciative remark about the ideals of young Indian womanhood from Mrs. Sarojini Naidu who bade them bon voyage. The Subodh Patrika trusts that this dress was adopted for convenience in travelling and not from imitation of western ways. The dress, however, is the one which the inmates of the Pathshala wear ordinarily. This writer paid a surprise visit when he was in Baroda last year and was highly impressed by the healthy, keen and determined faces which he saw there. The girls who come from well-to-do Hindu families, are brought up in strict accord with the principles of the Arya Samaj as to diet and religious, physical and mental training. A young boy who saw the lathi play of these sturdy girls was struck dumb with astonishment. The girls were absolutely free from self-consciousness. This writer was particularly struck by the collected, cool manner in which one of the girls gave orders at a drill which was hastily arranged on the occasion. A shrill whistle, and a score of young girls ran out from different part of the buildings and took their places in the ranks. The dress, shorts and shirts, did not seem in the least outlandish in the surroundings which had so much else to emphasise the national character of the training imparted at the institution. On the other hand, one appreciated the independence of mind which did not shrink from adopting a foreign-seeming costume when it was found necessary to the active and free life in which the girls were being brought up. The Pathshala, by the way, is not a State institution. It is maintained from private funds.

Mr. Sastri and Mr. Brelvi:—In the leading article last week we wrote that Mr. Sastri in saying that the White Paper scheme which he strongly disapproves of, should nevertheless be utilised to forward the cause of self-government, only advocated what Mr. Brelvi in his signed article in the Bombay Chronicle declared should be the policy of the National Congress. Mr. Brelvi writes to say that while he was for giving up Civil Disobedience he did not accept the White Paper nor the policy of the Liberal Party.

1933-11-11 -Indian Social Reformer on Pirana (683)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 3]

This is quite true. What we had in mind was, the policy of the Congress towards the present system as recommended by Mr. Brelvi is not dissimilar to the policy recommended by Mr. Sastri to the White Paper Constitution.

The Indo-Japanese Trade Pact:—In an appreciative comment on the labours of Sir Joseph Bhome and others which have resulted in the Indo Japanese Trade Pact, the Indian Witness offers an apt criticism of the principle underlying all such pacts. The Pact provides that the amount of Japanese cloth imported into India should bear a certain proportion to the amount of cotton which Japan takes from this country. The Witness observes: "Why should India be anxious about selling raw cotton when what is needed is cloth? Japan is the one who should be seeking favours. She cannot make cloth without cotton and she must go some where for it, India is throwing away her advantage and is forced to make trade agreements. She ought to be able to buy her own cotton at a higher rate than Japan can give and still sell her own cloth at less than Japan can quote. As it is India loses twice—once by taking less for her cotton than local markets should be able to give and again when she pays for Japanese cloth a price that includes the freight on the cotton to Japan and on the cloth to India in addition to the cost of making the cloth. India will never prosper as she should while this goes on."

Search for a Sterile Period:—We reprint from the Catholic Examiner in another column a paragraph headed, "Is there a Sterile Period?" It would seem that the Catholic opposition to the use of contraceptives does not extend to the timing of marital relations to periods which preclude conception. This method too is a contraceptive method and advocates of birth control have discarded it only because they think that there is no "safe" period. It seems, however, that a Catholic scientist has discovered that there is one. It is interesting to note that from ancient times Hindus have a belief that there is a certain period which is most favourable to conception. This implies that there are other periods which are less favourable and the be researches of the Catholic scientist seem to corroborate it. But the point of interest is, if it is irreligious to use contraceptives can it religious to choose deliberately a time when conception cannot occur? The motive in both cases is the same: "Safety first."

"Repatriates" from South Africa:—Indian Opinion gives the following figure of Indians "repatriated" from South Africa under the assisted voluntary repatriated scheme. Altogether 2,363 Indians were repatriated to India during the year 1932-33, states the Auditor-General in his report on various Government accounts for that year. This was done at a cost of £55,617 to the Indian Immigration Bureau, which included £34,257 paid as bonuses and £13,668 in respect of ship passage money.

Back to China:—We had occasion to refer some months back to the famous novelist, Mrs. Pearl S. Buck, who gave up missionary work in China on account of differences with her mission board. We print from The World Tomorrow the report of a speech delivered by her on her return to China a couple of months ago. Mrs. Buck is not only bilingual; she is bi-cultural. In a shilling booklet issued by Messrs. Methuen and Co. last year entitled "Is There a Case for Foreign Missions?" she remarks, "By birth and ancestry I am American; by choice and belief I am a Christian; but by the years of my life, by sympathy and feeling, I am Chinese." In another respect Mrs. Buck also presents a singular example: many workers in mission fields have felt obliged to sever their connection with their mission boards. But few have been able to return to the field of their mission activity after the break.

Limitation or Disarmament?—Speaking at the Bombay International Fellowship on January 23, Dr. Shailer Mathews remarked that the Disarmament Conference had concerned itself rather with the kinds of armaments to be allowed to nations than with the abolition of armaments. The very restriction of arms by agreement is undoubtedly no mean achievement but there has been little to show that even this small reform is nearer today than when the conference first met. The latest developments reveal that Britain has recommended equality in armaments for nations. As a substitute for the old international anarchy of "to each according to his need" there is much to commend it, and efforts directed towards securing its general acceptance are not altogether wasted. Something more will have to be done, however, if the dangers of "ultra-nationalism" to which the Pope alluded in a recent interview, are to averted in Europe.

Women's Education:—The attitude of Indian Universities towards woman's education is widely differing. Whilst Bengal has shown itself ultra-sensitive to the needs of its women students—an experiment, not very successful it is true, was made recently by way of meeting the objections of those who opposed co-education by instituting morning classes for women—Bombay has steadily refused to provide for a hostel for women studying at the affiliated colleges in the city. At a recent meeting of the Syndicate a proposal for a central hostel under University control and supervision for women students, was thrown out. One of the arguments advanced against the resolution was that if such a hostel was set up in Bombay all the other centres will have to similarly provided for. Apart from the fact that every individual demand can be dealt with on its merits, and we do not see how conceding a hostel for women in Bombay will prejudice this right of the Senate, this objection does not sufficiently allow for the different conditions maintaining to Bombay and the greater field from which its students are drawn.

BOMBAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1934.

COMMUNALISM AND PROVINCIALISM.

The greatest and worst fault of the White Paper scheme of Indian constitutional reforms, is the splitting up of British India into eleven separate statutory units. From the first we have regarded this as a feature portending infinite friction and confusion. We strongly support federation of British India as a unitary Government with the States. The fullest autonomy can be given to the provinces by devolution from the centre. Instead of cutting up British India into eleven pieces and, then devising safeguards to keep them together, the unitary form should be maintained and the largest possible measure of freedom allowed to the provinces within it. By adopting this course many difficulties can be solved with greater simplicity and certainty than by following the one proposed in the White Paper. One of these is the amount of autonomy to be given to different provinces. All provinces may not be ready at once for the same quantity and quality of autonomy. Within unitary British India, suitable variations can be effected from time to time in accordance with the requirements and capacity of each province. Then, there is the important question of deficit provinces. If British India continues to be a whole, contributions to these provinces will be a legitimate charge on its revenues. These are some important issues. But more important than them is the fostering of the sense of unity which is the most valuable result of British rule. This sense of unity was the basis of the Indian National Congress and allied organisations. The introduction of communal franchise did much to break it up. Within recent years, another and worse disruptive force has made its appearance. This is Provincialism which threatens to destroy all sense of unity and common-nationality in the minds of the people of the provinces.

We are glad that this danger is coming to be realised. Sheth Mathuradas Vissanji, President of the Indian Merchants Chamber called attention at its annual meeting last Saturday to the growing tendency to import provincial rivalry in questions of trade and commerce. "I hope," he said, "I need not make any excuse for referring in my speech to the existence of provincial feelings even with regard to commerce and industries. There are communal feelings and we have learnt to our cost what a force for evil these have become not only with regard to our political progress but even with regard to our trade and industry. It was the provincial feeling which made itself manifest and voting both in the committee stage and in the Assembly stage (on the question of super rates) was to a certain extent deflected by provincial consideration." Sheth Mathuradas went on to explain how leading men in Bombay and Bengal had striven to compose the difference between their two points of view. He added: "It is not only with regard to several other issues that the provincial considerations are likely to be exploited by interested parties for driving a wedge in the national forces; and it behoves all of us to see that we do not allow this new cancer to have its growth as we have already allowed the cancer of communalism which is sapping away the vitality of the nation as a whole." What chances are there of our being able to prevent this new calamity when the provinces are formally and legally created separate units as proposed in the White Paper scheme, when even now provincialism is fast becoming a menace to national solidarity? Careful observers have remarked that there is less of inter provincial sympathy now than there was fifteen or twenty years ago. The United Bengal in its issue of January 20, bitterly complains of the treatment of Bengal by Bihar and Bombay. It observes: "It cannot be expected that Bengal will all along maintain a spirit of altruism. It has been declared that Bihar is for the Biharis, Madras for the Madrasis, U. P. for the U. P. Wallahs, Guzarat for the Guzaratis, and Maharashtra for the Mahrattas. Bengal cannot consequently continue for all. Time has come when she also must go back upon her age-old policy of open door and bang and bolt it against all intrusion from outside."

The Tribune of Lahore in a thoughtful leading article in its issue of the 21st January also calls attention to the new danger of provincialism. "For close upon fifty years," it writes, "the Congress has been preaching the ideal of Indian unity. For a still longer time the existence of a Central Government and of the same laws and civic and political institutions, the railways, telegraphs, English education and the more intimate contact with the rest of the world which modern conditions have rendered possible, have been slowly and silently but none the less potently influencing the minds of men and women in India in the same direction. But the fact remains that for some years now a conscious and deliberate attempt has been made to weaken and undermine the ideal of united India." In addition to the communal separatism, two others are in operation to obstruct unity. These are the provincial division and the antagonism sought to be created between rural and urban interests. The Tribune observes that in all three cases the forces of disintegration and division have had a semi-official origin and they have throughout been partially backed by officials though it is only fair to add that in all three cases the forces have been carried a long way farther by non-officials. It derives satisfaction from the fact that the three forces are antagonistic to each other. Communalism cuts athwart provincialism and rural-urban antagonism. Provincialism cannot co-exist with communalism nor the difference of interests between rural and urban areas. The Tribune believe that the three forces will destroy each other and leave the field clear to nationalism. We are afraid this is a vain hope. The communalists are the great champions of independent provinces. The White Paper proposals to vivisection British India are in accord with their ideas. People who are able to think nationally have in despair acquiesced in the proposal. But the issue is too important to be allowed to pass without at least a strong protest. We have ever since the publication of the White Paper pointed to this feature of the scheme as the root evil. We are glad others are now awakening to its dangers. We trust it will be possible to make an organised attempt to get this proposal modified. It can be modified without touching other parts of the scheme. The States do not care whether British India enters the Federation as a whole or as separate provinces.

INDIAN STATES AND PUBLIC OPINION—I.

(BY K. NATARAJAN.)

I am not the subject of any Indian State. But I had chosen early in life a field of public activity which overleaps political jurisdictions. The Indian social reformer has to take note not only of the state of things in British India but also in the Indian States. The great leader of the social reformer movement, Mahadev Govind Ranade, indeed, held that what is happening in the States is of even greater sociological interest than happenings in British India. For the heart of India, he said, beats in the Indian States. Some of the States have outpaced British India by the measures which they have taken to advance social reform. Mysore and Baroda adopted measures against child-marriage and the amelioration of the condition of the depressed classes years before we in British India were able to do. In respect of free elementary education, if woman's rights of property and of removing legal impediments to the mitigation of caste divisions and restrictions, Baroda is even now ahead of British India. I may also mention Bhavnagar which alone among the States and Provinces of India has introduced and is successfully carrying out the policy of total prohibition in its territories; Travancore whose young Maharaja has signalled the opening years of his reign by according to his subjects of the untouchable classes rights and liberties previously denied to them, which has earned for His Highness the warm congratulations of Gandhiji, the great champion of Harijans; and the powerful impetus given by His Exalted Highness the Nizam to the cause of woman's emancipation from cramping customs by his public declaration and practical example in his own household in favour of the abolition of purdah which, with child marriage, is responsible for the stunting of the physique and intellect of Indian women. To me, as a social reformer, these are services of the first magnitude to the cause of national regeneration; and great is the debt of gratitude we owe to these States and rulers for their powerful support of these vital reforms. The political backwardness of the States naturally strikes the politician as the chief fact about them. The social reformer, however, is necessarily obliged to set against this backwardness the greater facilities which the States have, and in some cases have already used, to advance social progress. In my younger days I was an admirer of Lord Dalhousie's policy of painting the whole of the country red. This, I thought, would have simplified the union of India into a single nation. So would have the conversion of the whole country to one of its important religions, or better still the abolition of all religions. These fancies are attractive to young minds; but they do not stand the test of mature study and experience. The decision to retain the States, which had not been already annexed, under their own ruling houses, was a sound one, sounder than the reasons which led to it at the time when it was taken. I am, therefore, a believer in the beneficial possibilities of the States and would support every measure calculated to consolidate their strength and to stimulate the enormous potentialities for good which they possess. I have no hesitation in echoing the sentiments which my friend Dewen Bahadur A. B. Lathe expressed in his admirable address to the Deccan States' Peoples Conference last month. "I have," he said, "all my sympathies with the attempts of the Princes to defend their rights, inherent as well as acknowledged by treaties, against encroachment. They are so many attempts to safeguard Indian freedom as far as it exists. There is no doubt that it exists to a greater degree in the States, if well managed. It is, therefore, a service to the cause of Indian freedom that the Rulers of the States should make every effort to maintain their sovereignty in their own States inviolate."

In introducing the Indian States' Protection Bill which this Special Conference is called to consider, the Hon. Sir Harry Haig, speaking as the Home Member of the Government of India, said, "Geographically, India is a whole. The Indian States and British India are inextricably intermingled. No great (or, I may add, small) geographical barriers, no racial distribution really separates the States from British India. We pass imperceptibly from one to the other. For good or for ill (I say only for good) the Indian States are part and parcel of India." We are grateful to the Home Member for recognising and so clearly enunciating this basic fact which is a commonplace to us, Indians, but which is often overlooked by the Paramount Power. We should have been still more grateful to him, if he had followed these premises to their legitimate conclusion, instead of pressing them into service as an argument for a measure which is bound to have the effect of penalizing the Press and people of British India for exerting themselves to bring about improvements in the Indian States, whose people are, so to speak, bone of their bone and flesh of their flesh. The Home Member, I am aware, assured the Assembly that there was nothing in the Bill to prevent the ventilation of genuine grievances, putting forward proposals for reform, the whole range of activities comprised in the word "Constitutional". We have had similar assurances in regard to other laws. Unfortunately, the courts do not take notice of assurances even by members of Government in interpreting statutes. We know from experience that the laws now proposed to be extended to the States, have, in British India where they have been in force for sometime, not always or invariably been interpreted in the light of the assurances given when they were before the Legislature. The Home Member's own conception of what is unconstitutional action is as vague as it is wide. "Bringing the administration into hatred or contempt" has been interpreted in various ways in British India where personal rule is largely a thing of the past. In many, perhaps most, States the ruler is the administration and the State. His personal likes and dislikes, virtues and vices, tastes and habits, affect the administration as they do not do in British India. These, therefore, attract criticism in connection with the administration. A city set upon a hill, cannot be hid. Weaknesses and foibles which in ordinary men pass without comment, are magnified and seem heinous in a person who stands on the highest eminence in the State. The fierce light which in all times and countries beats upon a throne, does not spare the gads of Indian rulers. It is the penalty of their great position. The only sure way of avoiding it, is for them to interpose between themselves and the world outside Ministers responsible to representative popular bodies. Wherever this has been done in India as well as in other lands, the throne has become immune from criticism. The universal indignation recently caused by an inadvertent remark of a Labour leader, Sir Stafford Cripps, reflecting on "Buckingham Palace", is an eloquent testimony to the sanctity which a constitution confers on the person of the monarch and the institution itself of monarchy.

I lay so much stress on this, as I have been often sickened by the amount of personal invective which bulks so largely in some criticisms of the administration of States when the rulers are personally responsible for it. I have discussed this unsavoury feature with responsible States' subjects, and their explanation is that the personal character of a ruler in such a case has a definite influence on the integrity of his officers and the purity of his administration. The Paramount Power can best protect such States and help them to a stable and prosperous existence by using its tremendous influence to induce them to adopt some form of constitutional administration, even of an elementary character. I suspect that it is these personal attacks which Princes feel most keenly, and this seems to me to be the only sure means of protecting them from them. Meanwhile, I would earnestly impress on all journalists who are conscious of the responsibilities of their great profession, to avoid as much as possible personal attacks on rulers, because such attacks defeat the very purpose of their criticisms, which is or ought to be to bring about improvement in the administration. To tell a man he is a hopeless imbecile, is not the way to encourage him to do better. There is, as the great religions teach us, a spark of the divine in all of us high and low, and reverence and charity are the qualities which kindle it to high endeavour.

Sir Harry Haig assumes, I do not know why, that the States should continue in their present condition for all time and that they should be maintained in them for the good of the country as a whole. This is so surprising a view to take for a responsible member of Government that it should be quoted in his own words. "I do not think", he said, "it requires much argument to show that the various Governments that exist in India—Governments certainly of widely different types, for the general type in the Indian States is quite different to that in British India and there are wide differences among the States themselves—these various Governments in India, however much they may differ in form, so long as they remain the Governments established by law and by constitutional right, so long it is necessary in the interests of the country as a whole, in the interests of the general stability of India as a whole, that those Governments should receive the support they require to protect them against attempts to subvert or interfere with them." Some States have made marked advances during our time, and with beneficial results to their own and the country's interests, and there is no reason why the others cannot do likewise. There is a law of survival applying to States as well as to races and species, and States which will not or cannot adapt themselves to the spirit of the time, by being protected from wind and weather, do not contribute to the interest or the stability of themselves or the country as a whole. Even if the Indian press abstains completely from commenting on the affairs of States, there are newspapers outside India and there are writers and publishers of books who are not amenable to British Indian laws and who do much more to bring the Princes into contempt than Indian newspapers of the most virulent type. It does not enhance the reputation or dignity of the Indian rulers to say that one of them spent £ 20,000 not many years ago on the marriage of two pet pigeons; that another summoned all his economists to consider how taxation might be raised in order to feed all the ants in the State in face of the increased price of rice, that intrigues are stated in the palace by jealous men and members of the royal house mysteriously disappear, as if this was an everyday occurrence; that one has three hundred motor cars in his garage, forty-two of them Rolls-Royce; that his father bought up a large Calcutta Store for £ 60,000 as he was annoyed at some delay in being served; and that yet another constructed a golden cow and crawled through it in public as a penance. All this is taken from a single book published in England. It was recently banned from being brought into India but several copies had arrived in India before the ban. Why does not the British Government which, after all, is the Paramount Power protect the Princes from the grossly vilifying caricatures that are published in England? Nothing that has been written in this country has done so much to injure the Princes in the eyes of the civilized world, as some of the things that have been written of them abroad. So long as Indian Princes remained in their own States or at least in the country, it did not matter what was written about them. But now they are going to Europe in increasing numbers, and exaggerated statements of the kind quoted above cannot but bring them and Indians as a nation into disrepute. As the Indian saying goes, you cannot shut the mouth of the world. The suppression of the small stream of crude Indian criticism is of no avail against the loud roar of calumny abroad.

ASIA'S PLACE IN THE WORLD'S CIVILIZATION—II

(BY JABEZ T. SUNDERLAND.)

At the great Parliament of Religions held in Chicago in the year 1893, there were distinguished representatives of all the leading non-Christian religions of the world, and also of all the more important Christian denominations of Europe and America. Among all the speakers there, who was listened to with the most profound interest? Who was very generally felt to represent at once the highest eloquence and the noblest and most impressive spiritual teaching in the Parliament? Was it some eminent Christian preacher or Christian teacher of the western world? I think I answer with candour and truth when I say, No; it was Mr. Mozoomdar, the representative of the Brahmo Samaj, and the Swami Vivekananda.

I recollect a conversation held some years ago with a merchant connected with one of the large shipping houses of London, which sold goods to nearly all parts of the world. The question came up of the honesty and moral character of different nations, Christian and non-Christian, European and Asiatic; and he informed me that of all the classes of people that his house dealt with, the Parsi merchants of India were regarded on the whole as the most entirely honourable and trustworthy.

Professor Max Muller of Oxford, the eminent oriental scholar, wrote a book entitled, "What Can India Teach Us?" The book contains a long and impressive chapter on "The Truthful Character of the Hindus." The writer begins by saying that there is an impression among many that the moral character of the Indian people is low, especially as regards truthfulness. This impression he endeavours to trace to its source, and then he lays before his readers testimony of many kinds and from the highest and most trustworthy sources, mainly English, showing that the Indian people, in their own native life and before they come in contact with Europeans, are singularly moral and truthful, as well as generally industrious, polite, and in many cases well qualified to be our teachers in the things of the higher life.

But enough has been said to help us a little, as I trust, to understand whether the leading nations of Asia are civilized or not: whether Asia has made as valuable contributions to the world's civilization and culture and higher life as has Europe or America, and whether the so-called white race has any justification for looking down with superciliousness or arrogance on the so-called yellow or brown race; or any justification whatever for refusing to meet the leading peoples of Asia as their equals in civilization, in culture, in intellectual ability, in moral worth.

We talk about the civilization. What is civilization? What is the test of civilization?

Is it military preparedness and a love for military things? Is it proficiency in war? If so, we must confess that Europe is more highly civilized than Asia, for Europe is an armed camp to an extent that Asia never has been and, let us hope, never will be.

Is the test of civilization the love of peace and the spirit of peace? Then I think we must confess that Asia is much more civilized than we of the West. Calling myself a Christian as I do, I confess with shame and humiliation my conviction, forced on me by my studies of history, that during the past thousand years the professedly Christian nations of Europe and America have fought more and bloodier wars than any nations of the Orient.

Is the test of civilization wealth and luxury? If so, then doubtless the West is in advance of the East. For while in certain parts of the East there are individual princes or hereditary rulers of more or less extended territories who have large hoarded riches and live in great extravagance, the number of these is small, and taking the East as a whole, there is nowhere such accumulation of vast wealth in the hands of the few, and nowhere such luxury, as in Europe and especially in America.

It was in Asia that there once lived a very great teacher, named Confucius, and another named Buddha, and another named Jesus, who taught that wealth and luxury are not the true marks of civilization or of high and noble life, but rather the opposite; who taught that the elevation of a land or a nation is to be measured not by its money but by its manhood.

Is the test of civilization philosophy, literature, and art? Then perhaps we must say that the Orient and the Occident—Asia on the one hand and Europe and America on the other—probably stand about on an equality. At the present time, perhaps the Occident is superior. I am not quite sure; but, taking the whole of human history together, I think the Orient must be given a not inferior place in art, in literature and in philosophy.

Is the test of civilization temperance? Then the Orient, Asia, is clearly superior. The East knows no such drinking and drunkenness as for centuries has been common in the West, and it has to be confessed that such drinking and drunkenness as has existed in the Orient has been caused largely by western liquor and western liquor saloons, practically forced on the eastern peoples. Buddha and Mohammed both forbade the use of intoxicating drinks. I think I may justly call the Buddhist and Mohammedan religions the two greatest temperance societies or temperance agencies in the world.

Is religion the test of civilization? Then clearly Asia stands far above the rest of the world. For, as we have seen, Asia is the mother of all the great historic religions of mankind, including those of both Europe and America.

I think many of the people of the West would make Science the supreme test of civilization.

Unquestionably Science is important, immensely so. But, is it the most important thing in the world? Is it not possible that this preeminently scientific age of ours is overestimating the value of science as compared with some other things? Science can produce money and wealth. It can produce ease and luxury. But can it produce men? Can it produce character?

Let us not forget that long, long before our boasted modern age of Science came into existence, some of the noblest and greatest men of all time lived and rendered their unsurpassed service to humanity, Confucius, Zoroaster, Buddha, Asoka, the Great, Socrates, Plato, Aeschylus, Marcus Aurelius, Epictetus, Isaiah, Paul, Jesus. Has our modern scientific age produced greater or nobler men than these?

In our age of science we are mad to pile up money, to amass vast wealth. We are mad to create buildings higher and higher, overtopping any that past ages dreamed of. We are mad to talk from city to city, from country to country, and round the world. But do we ask whether living in skyscrapers and talking around the earth makes us any better men, or life any happier? We are mad to cross the Atlantic in four days, instead of in weeks as our fathers did. We are mad to get a railway train service of 85 or 90 miles an hour; and an automobile speed as great or greater; and to fly at a speed far, far beyond that.

But is all this lightning change of pace adding to our manhood and womanhood? Are we any better men and women flying, than our fathers and mothers were walking?

Do we care for any higher things morally and spiritually; are our friendships truer, are our homes more full of kindness and love, are we living for any worthier ends of life, now that we press a button and light our houses with electricity, than we did when we went to bed with a tallow dip?

These questions, and others similar, are being very seriously asked by the people of Asia. Would it not be well if we, of the scientific West, asked them much oftener than we do?

Is the test of civilization its power to produce contented and happy people? There are many intelligent people in Asia who believe that the degree of happiness and contentment found there is much greater than in Europe or America.

Comparing the civilization of Asia with that of the West, the former seems to have the greater simplicity, the greater naturalness, the greater poise, the greater power to satisfy. There seems to be in Asia more leisure, more time for thought and enjoyment, less slavery to money and material conditions.

less torment by ambition, more reverence for the past, more respect for parents and for the aged, less competition, more co-operation, more attention given to good manners and the amenities of life, quite as much appreciation of nature, quite as much appreciation of friends, quite as much enjoyment of home, less strenuousness of life in business and in money getting, more strenuousness in religion, less care for the temporal, more for the eternal, less absorption in the material, more in the spiritual.

Unquestionably the East has much to learn from the West. But I believe, too, that the Occident has much to learn from the Orient. That is to say, I find myself compelled to believe that the too haughty and too opinionated daughter, Europe, and grand-daughter America, have very much to learn from their great, old-fashioned mother and grandmother, Asia, who has very much more wisdom in her sage old head, and very much more goodness in her kindly old heart, than the daughter and grand-daughter have humility enough, and teachableness enough quite to understand.

We complain because Asia is not like Europe. Why should she be? We complain because oriental civilization differs from our own. Is it any worse for that? Is it desirable that all civilizations should be of one type? Asiatic civilization has its excellencies and its defects. European civilization has its defects and its excellencies. Let us each get the appreciative and teachable spirit, that will enable us to learn each from the other.

What will be Asia's future? Will she become like Europe? In some respects, yes. In more respects, no. Asia is going to receive our science, our knowledge, our inventions. Everything shows that. But she will not receive them indiscriminately or blindly, and she will not be carried off her feet by them to anything like the extent that we have been.

Asia will learn from Europe whatever of value Europe has to teach. The question for us to ask is, Will we learn from Asia the land which has been the mother of the world's civilization, the land of wisdom greater than we realize—will we learn from her what she has to teach?

Is there a Sterile Period. Thus catholic Examiner—Dr. Raoul de Guichenere, who writes on this subject in the December Homiletic and Pastoral Review is impressed by the enormous importance of the Knaus-Ogino discoveries regarding the agenesic period; he foresees "a time when the Knaus-Ogino method will be universally known, and young people will contract marriage with an exact knowledge of the sterile and fertile days." He thinks that the fears expressed by certain Catholic moralists that "periodical continence is simply a stepping-stone to Neo-Malthusianism" may easily be exaggerated, and that it is to be expected that "the moral education of our Catholic youth will preserve them from such a total lack of generosity. Throughout the article it is assumed that the question of an agenesic period has been definitely settled." On this point a wellknown moralist, writing in the Irish Ecclesiastical Record for November is less positive.

"We are of opinion that there is need for caution in regard to acceptance of the medical findings. On the question of the length of time during which the ovum remains fertilizable there has been no direct investigation or direct evidence; there has been an inference from experiments on other animals, such as rabbits. It is quite possible that the human ovum may in certain circumstances remain fertile for several days. A further point—there is no evidence to exclude extraordinary ovulation or the occurrence of ovulation several days before the normal period. With these reserves, we, however, must admit that a very strong case has been made for the existence of a sterile period."

* INDIAN STATES IN THE DECCAN.

(By DIWAN BAHADUR A. B. LATHE.)

Our States were in their origin the subordinate but essential parts of an organic Empire. They sought to free themselves from the duties which a limb owes to the whole of which they were parts. They succeeded. But in the process, they became as dead as the body itself. The Mahratta Empire fell; but in its fall, the independence which all its constituents shared also perished. British India ceased to be India and the States also ceased to be Indian States and became British Indian States. Both were equally conquered by a foreign Power, though the appearances were different in the two cases. The Paramountcy of the Crown as the Rulers prefer to call it was in truth the equivalent of the supremacy of the British in the annexed territories of what were the Indian States of the past. This is a fact which some of our Rulers seem to forget. It is needless to justify the birth of this external supremacy throughout India, whether British or Indian. Those who want to claim that the States are internally sovereign make much of the terms of treaties between the East India Company and the States. I have all my sympathies with the attempts of the Princes to defend their rights, inherent as well as acknowledged by treaties, against encroachment. They are so many attempts to safeguard Indian freedom as far as it exists. There is no doubt that it exists to a greater degree in the States, if well-managed. It is therefore a service to the cause of Indian freedom that the Rulers of States should make every effort to maintain their sovereignty in their own States 'inviolable and inviolable'. But this does not mean that hard facts should be ignored. The Princes have devoted very great efforts and funds to limit Paramountcy to a contractual liability on the one hand and a right on the other strictly limited to the terms of the contract embodied in treaties. They have hitherto failed in that contention, and in one sense they have failed rightly. It is quite true that under the guise of Paramountcy resulting from usage and sufferance the British Government has made unjustified inroads on the domain of internal powers retained by the States. But to say that the relationship between the British Power and the States is merely contractual is to ignore the fact that treaties were far from voluntary contracts on the side of the States, and in most cases they were dictated by hard necessity if not by compulsion. In spite of the terms used—and the British Government will never admit that they have ever gone beyond those terms—the Paramount Power has always dealt with the States as subordinate Governments subject to what is euphemistically called 'political advice.' In its true inwardness, the character of Paramountcy is determined by the strength of the conquering Power and the weakness of the conquered States. The remedy lies not in the construction of words used a hundred years ago but in the strength of the parties concerned. Military strength is obviously out of the question and one may be excused for expressing one's feelings with a smile when a champion of the States gravely announces that the secession of the States from Federal India does not mean their going out of the British Empire. Held together by the chains of the military power of the British nation, it is futile for the States to talk of Paramountcy being limited to this or that—in fact it is limited to what the British Power considers it expedient to limit it to—or of their willing loyalty to the Crown without acknowledging the all-pervading supremacy of the British Power.

* Presidential Address at tenth session of Deccan States People's Conference.

in India—British as well as Indian. It is in the enhancement of the moral strength of the States—and this consists entirely in the States becoming living, growing entities with an internal vitality of their own—that the justification for the restriction of Paramountcy within well-defined limits lies. Rulers claiming absolute powers of personal rule, unable to provide for as good administration as is demanded by changing times, suppressing popular agitation by force, assuming that they are the States and the subjects are their property, arrogating all wisdom to their untrained and even inexperienced selves, relying upon an external authority for protection not only against internal commotions but even against newspaper criticism outside their areas, praised to the skies at one moment and faced with an enquiry or virtual abdication at the next, what moral justification or political strength can they claim for the demand that Paramountcy should be a strictly limited authority confined to the four corners of century-old treaties? A living body is living because it possesses within itself a power to arrest decay, to destroy poisonous bacilli attacking from outside and to enable itself to grow in strength. A State is a living reality only insofar as it is self-limited and self-corrected, eliminating faults not by advice from outside but by the action of internal vitality. The exact form of Government is of secondary importance. The essence lies in the capacity of the Ruler and his subjects to correct each other, to help to live and grow a corporate life. The freedom of the subjects must be limited by the authority of of the Ruler and the latter must exercise powers under the control of the people in the State. When identity of interest is established between the two, when the greatness of the Ruler becomes a source of strength to his subjects and the latter's prosperity becomes the glory of the former, the mutual control ceases to be a control at all and the people's obedience to the laws of the Ruler becomes their true liberty in the same way as the checks on the Prince's authority strengthen that authority. This implies, firstly, absence of external control and, secondly, growth of a strong public opinion capable of self-assertion. Paramountcy makes both these essentials of a healthy State impossible. Under its shadows, the Ruler learns more and more to be a puppet wirepulled from behind the curtains and unaffected by the will of his subjects. On the other hand, instead of attempting to influence and check the Ruler by the exercise of an effective popular will the people in a State living an inane life under that shade, look up to the good offices of the outside Power to redress their grievances. This leads to the further weakening of the Ruler and his increased dependence on external forces. Circumstanced as the Paramount Power is in India, its intervention merely seeks to keep the evils within bounds but not to remove their causes and exterminate them. While under the Bombay Government, our States had the corrective treatment of Paramountcy administered to them in small but perpetual doses. The Government of India, acting as an outside political authority would ordinarily do, leave evils to grow until they become intolerable and its blow falls very heavily when it does fall. The Ruler pursues his wrong policy in false security until misgovernment becomes incurable except by his abdication, by his leaving the State for an indefinite time or by his deposition. Even then, the Paramount Power only checks the more acute evils and stops the grosser forms of injustice. But it does not consider it part of its duty to adopt radical changes in the Administration so as to make the rebirth of those evils impossible. The Political Department would not make a generation-old Municipality in a State under its temporary management even partially elective or introduce a merely consultative Legislature in that State on the ground that the Ruler may not like it on his attaining majority. The neighbouring States may have adopted such reforms. The Regent may consent to them. But the Paramount Power does not, and the Princely Order would not, introduce them and asks the subjects to wait for decades for a small and elementary reform which they must hope to secure after their Ruler chooses to grant it. He in his turn would make organised public opinion impossible by promulgating his Press Laws and his Public Meetings Acts. So any public agitation within the State is impossible and if made outside, it is the mischief of disgruntled men running away from their homes! Whatever it is, the Paramount Power looks on with apparent indifference, or even with satisfaction, if the Ruler concerned is shrewd enough, or the agitators are unwise enough to be associated with what are considered undesirable movements in British India until again matters become what they did recently in Kashmir or in Alwar or in Dewas. This vicious circle is unavoidable as long as our States derive their very right to exist from the Paramount Power. The helpless condition of the subject, due not only to the repressive policy, which is not always within the bounds of Law, but due equally to the lack of character and public spirit among the people and their communal and caste cleavages, drives them to seek shelter at the hands of the Power to which the States also owe their life, so that the Ruler as much as the ruled are without initiative, without self-reliance, and without internal vitality. This also leads to the interference in States affairs by outside bodies like the All-India Kashmir Committee. As matters stand, the action of everyone concerned, the Ruler, his subjects, the Political Department and the British Indian people, has some justification for itself. But this is the result of the unnatural condition in which our States are living and that condition makes real progress in the States impossible.

AN APPEAL FROM BIHAR.

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The undersigned, being the Committee formed for organising the collection of the Viceroy's Earthquake Relief Fund in Bihar and Orissa, are using their best efforts to encourage subscriptions from our own people, in order that those in other parts of India and in the Western world may know that we in this Province are doing our utmost for our own people. The damage has been so great that the work of reconstruction in the stricken towns and villages will involve an enormous amount of money. To justify adequate generosity on the part of others, it is necessary that we should tax our own charitable resources to the utmost limit. The distribution of all funds collected will be in other hands and does not immediately concern this Committee, but subscribers may rest well assured that arrangements will be made for the strictest control and economical management of their donations, and a Committee for this purpose has already been appointed by His Excellency the Governor. The membership of this Committee is such as to inspire complete public confidence.

Donations from persons in Bihar and Orissa should be sent to the Imperial Bank, or to the Collector of the district or through the Sub-divisional Officers, who have received the necessary instructions for this purpose. All subscriptions will be duly acknowledged. Subscribers (particularly those whose contributions must of necessity be limited to small amounts) should refuse to pay anything to unauthorised collectors. No collections for the Viceroy's Fund should be made except by persons duly authorised by the Sub-divisional Officer. Donations from persons living outside Bihar and Orissa should preferably be sent direct to the Agent of the Imperial Bank of India (Patna Branch), who will acknowledge the same.

"THE MIDDLE CLASSES' HEAVY DEBTS."

The Editor,
Indian Social Reformer,
Sir,

I was very much interested to read the article on "The Middle Classes Heavy Debts" published in last week's issue of the Reformer. The writer is probably not aware that the benefits of the co-operative credit system are not confined to the rural classes, but that co-operative credit societies have been formed in urban areas as well, principally among the middle classes. The city of Bombay alone possesses nearly 200 such societies. Some of these being for employees of various firms and offices, others for persons belonging to different castes and sub-castes and a few being people's banks of the cosmopolitan type. Further information about the membership, constitution and working of the societies may be obtained from the undersigned.

Yours etc.,

THE BARROWS LECTURES.

"INDIVIDUAL HAS ETERNAL PERSONAL VALUES."

Complete individuality as the goal of Christianity was the subject of Dr. Shailer Mathews' fourth Barrows lecture, which was delivered in Wilson College with the Rev. A. N. Warner in the chair.

Dr. Mathews said that the fundamental presupposition of Christianity is that the individual has eternal personal values. Psychology has lost its consciousness by concentrating on the subconscious part of personality. Hedonistic and sensualistic philosophers arise when study is confined to things outside personal human values.

The goal of life determines the moral system of a religion. No ethnic or national religions have been based on the belief that personality is extinguished by death. It is difficult to see the significance of the Christian doctrine of salvation without taking into account the conception of the future life.

But Christianity does not claim to give a detailed account of what the state of the future life shall be. Paul spoke of a "spiritual body" and Augustine believed that the bodies of all would be massed together and that out of that mass bodies would be made and assigned to individuals. The important thing is that we are to be real personalities and not ghosts.

The concentration of Christianity upon deliverance from Satan, sin and death explain the emphasis put on certain means of salvation. This concentration upon the saving of the soul is often criticised as being selfish and unworthy.

But the criticism is unfair and rises from a misunderstanding of the value of personality. According to the Christian point of view perfection does not come by introspection, but by a socialization of the individual that is, by becoming loving. Christianity is thus at one with modern philosophy in insisting upon the social quality of love instead of acquisitiveness.

Christian thought, however, is not identical with certain modern doctrines of self-realisation, since the idea of social service as the way of realisation is not present in them.

But the technique of Christianity has not always been as perfect as its motive. For instance, asceticism, the withdrawal from society, was brought in from the pagan world but it is not found in the New Testament.

The lecturer then went on to show the part played by Christianity in the growth of democracy and the recognition of the political rights of the individual. Tracing the development of the idea of equality he showed how it came gradually to include women in its comprehension. The Christian Church never denied the privileges granted to woman by society, although at times it had given its sanction to inequalities.

Through periods of licence and violence it was the protector of women, and it has maintained the monogamist family as a permanent institution.

The lecturer concluded by saying that it was the task of this generation to organise equality into a morality.

CHRISTIANITY AND GROUP MORALITY.

Dr. Shailer Mathews, in his fifth Barrows Lecture, spoke on "Christianity and Group Morality." Mr. Francis Low presided.

The social trend, he said, has been towards the recognition of groups which are economic in character. These groups, which are almost self-conscious bodies, affect the individuals that make them up.

The behaviour of groups is only gradually influenced by Christian ideals. It must be borne in mind that these groups are instrumental in character, and should not be made ends in themselves. The group exists to enable individuals to achieve in common what they cannot accomplish by themselves.

The neglect of this instrumental character of the group becomes marked as the group becomes more highly organised. We find even the Christian community so far forgetful of its real end as to have recourse to persecution in order to preserve its integrity as a group.

Groups must get their morality from a higher groups, a sort of super-group, because morality requires more than one unit. The basic values of Christianity will render supreme value here. These groups must be brought under the control of what we think religion stands for.

The Christian movement has never succumbed to economic passivity, but nevertheless it has been slow to recognise the bearing of its principles on economic life. The early Christians had no interest in economic life.

Historical study shows that what is often spoken of as "communism" in the early Church was nothing more than an emergency charity.

Charity as distinct from economic re-adjustment became the expression of Christianity; it was the application of Christian principles to existing social conditions.

The lecturer then described how Capitalism in the economic sphere and Calvinism in the religious sphere both arose from the desire for security in life. Calvinism gave the security of the Sovereign God. To-day we are again faced with a feeling of insecurity. Can love and co-operation be bases on which society can be built, or must groups be coerced into doing what is good for them.

With the Industrial Revolution there were changes, the serf became the wage-earner, but there was still no intelligent treatment of social problems. To-day we are faced with the rapid introduction of machinery. The problem is "What is to become of the men?"

An attempt had been made to check the introduction of machinery but not enough has been done to try to meet the new social conditions caused by the introduction of machinery.

Dr. Mathews then showed how in this century the Christian Church has been awakening to its duty in facing these problems and the need for social readjustment. He spoke of the development of the "social gospel."

The real difficulty, he concluded, is that the social senses have been developed, but a technique has not yet been invented which can be universally adopted.

This is the great opportunity of to-day.

THE PROBLEM OF PEACE.

The last of the series of Barrows Lectures was given by Dr. Shailor Mathews On Friday, January 26, when he spoke on "Christianity and Internationalism". The Rev. John McKenzie presided.

Dr. Mathews said that modern nations had become very self-conscious and anthropomorphic; for example in the matter of international debt, nations are treated almost as individual debtors or creditors. Christian writers assert that the principles of the Sermon on the Mount should be applied nationally, and this is a good ideal; but the question arises whether nations can be brought within the category of individual morality.

The relation of presidents and kings has always been one of hostility modified by treaties. Only in recent years has there been an attempt to introduce judicial measures in place of war. The moral character of a group differs from that of the individual because the group is an instrument in the life of its constituents and not an end in itself. The individuals making up the group would continue even if the group were destroyed. But nationalism once made moral would be a real aid to a happier world.

What is more important than the banishing of War is the development of things which positively made for peace and right international relations. We must remove the causes of war—economic retaliation, the dumping of surplus products on another nation, unscrupulous journalism and other things.

The ideals are there, but the technique lags behind. What would morality expect of a nation, he asked.

We are not yet clear what national morality involves. Internationalism is a morality between nations. Some super society—a society of nations—is required. There is no short cut to internationalism. It will only come by experience in living together in good will.

The world depression cannot be removed until men live according to the cosmic process, which religiously speaking, is the will of God. It is the business of every religion that believes in the principle of love to see that the world faced with the alternative of morality or chaos, shall choose the way that leads to peace and progress.

Dr. Mathews then spoke of the influence of the Christian churches in politics and the conflicts between Church and State. He declared that social reforms have always been inspired, if not directly by Christians, undoubtedly by the fermentation of Christian ideals.

It is the duty of Christians to prevent nationalism from taking the place of religion.

The lecturer then showed how even the medieval Christian Church did make some attempt to put limitations upon war; and how later under the influence of Grotius Christians endeavoured to bring Christian morality into international affairs. But the tide of belligerent nationalism has been too strong. He closed with a strong appeal to the audience to do what they could to give politics a moral direction.

The Chairman summing up, thanked the lecturer and suggested that what was needed was a better understanding of God. The important thing he said is not so much what we think of God but what He thinks of us.

HINDUISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

(By MR. J. T. GWYNN, I.C.S., Retired.)

The other day I saw with interest that "The Indian Social Reformer" had fallen foul of a lecture delivered by Sir Malcolm Hailey in England. The cause of offence seemed to be that Sir Malcolm had spoken of Hinduism as about to disintegrate. "The Social Reformer" took this as a slight to what we may, for convenience, call the Hindu Religion and countered by our old friend, the "Tu quoque" contending that Sir Malcolm showed himself prejudiced by ignoring the far more serious progress towards disintegration in European Christianity.

I have not now before me the text either of Sir Malcolm's lecture or of "The Social Reformer's" rebuke but I suspect a misunderstanding of the kind which so often engenders heat when an European ventures to speculate on Indian tendencies. I do not remember that Sir Malcolm Hailey indulged in any direct or implied comparison of the state of Hinduism and the state of Christianity and when I read the lecture it did not occur to me that a Hindu would be likely to take offence at anything that was said in it of the disintegration of Hinduism. That is because we Westerners usually use the word Hinduism to describe not so much a religion but rather a social system. Of course no sharp distinction can be drawn between the religion and the social system—they merge and blend. Still we Westerners, in speaking of Hinduism, are thinking of that aspect which is analogous to "Christendom" rather than to Christianity. In Europe "Christendom" characteristically manifested in itself in the growth of highly organised authoritarian churches with fixed and definite creeds and elaborate and efficient systems of government. The corresponding aspect of Indian "Hinduism" has manifested itself chiefly in the caste and family system. Now modern tendencies in Europe, democracy, universal literacy and the scientific habit of mind have certainly gone very far towards disintegrating the Christian churches. In fact, we may almost say that the Protestant churches have been thoroughly disintegrated and that the Church of Rome alone shows any power to resist the process that being because she alone has organised herself consciously or at least she has done the work far more thoroughly than the others. Undoubtedly this process of disintegration, which has affected vitally the power of the clergy—once a great political force—has gone very far—much further than the disintegration of the caste system in India. I hardly think that either Sir Malcolm Hailey or any other Western observer would be inclined to deny this. But as "The Social Reformer" rightly points out, the disintegration of the caste and family would leave untouched the core of Hinduism, those philosophical speculations on the essence and relations of God, Man and the Universe, which have taken us as far as human thought can go and perhaps a little further. Similarly many Westerners hold that the disintegration of the churches of Christendom will help rather than hinder an understanding of the moral teaching of Christ and may leave the West more ready to be influenced in action by the spur of his teaching.

It must, however, be admitted that both in the East and in the West there are men of high character and great intellectual power, who fear that the process of disintegration will prove fatal not only to the body but also to the spirit of religion. At least I understand there are men of the first class in India who fear the consequences of the admission of un-touchables into the caste temples or of caste intermarriages. Similarly, here in the British Isles we have heard Hugh Cecil calling for legal action to stop the Bishop of Liverpool from inviting the dis-integrators of old doctrines to expound their views of the essence of Christianity in his churches.

We may find it difficult to sympathize with such particular examples of the opposition to the process of disintegration. Yet we cannot be blind to many facts which warn us that disintegration is always a dangerous process and may be the starting point for new unpleasant and unwholesome forms of integration. We need caution and patience with our opponents whose strength and virtues we must learn to understand; still the process of disintegration must go on and the duty of all Liberals Western and Eastern alike is to help, guide and control it both in the West and in the East.

Far indeed be it from us Westerners to quarrel with you Easterners over this process of "modernization" or renovation by disintegration or to say scornfully "you are disintegrating faster than we." It is in this powerful process of modernisation that West and East can help each other. For the West has some experience of the individual's freedom of action in the social system which you in India are only now acquiring through the disintegration of caste and family systems. On the other hand India has for ages been accustomed to a freedom of thought which the disintegration of the churches is only now making possible for the average European. Your religious speculations have never been trammelled by divinely ordained systems of church government and authoritarian dogmas which even to-day in the British Isles, the schools painfully in-culcate into the children of sceptical parents. I read the other day in the Madras "Guardian" an Indian Christian's impression of the famous book in which a Protestant clergyman describes the motives, arguments and experiences which led him into the Church of Rome. To the Indian Christian his mental processes seemed unintelligible or uninteresting because they were concerned with questions like the dogma of the sacraments, apostolic succession and so forth. The Indian Christian regretted or pretended to regret that he and his fellow Indians had not yet interested themselves in such subjects but surely his state is therefore the more gracious. These subtleties only appeared important to Western eyes because the authoritarian churches rashly made authoritative pronouncements on them. The essence of Christianity was to be sought elsewhere as Indian Christians instinctively feel because they enjoy the advantage of the Hindu background and tradition with its freer and therefore larger, wider and better proportioned view of things spiritual.

CHINA, OLD AND NEW.

(BY MRS. PEARL S. BUCK.)

I have the greatest pleasure tonight in being here, and in seeing a group of people like yourselves interested in literature and in arts and in all culture. Even more than that, however, I am glad to be back again in China, a country which is in a peculiar way my own, even though I cannot claim as my own her race or her traditions. Fate has compelled me to be a sort of internationalist whether I will or not. I belong because I must to two countries, and am in a strange way divided. I remember my consternation as a very small child once when my little neighbour and playmate, a Chinese child, in a fit of disagreement over some game called me "a foreigner." I ran to my mother weeping and asking her, "Mother, I am not a foreigner, am I?" She answered very quietly, "Go back and tell Bao Lei that only your outside is foreign. Your heart inside is Chinese." But I think my own idea of such things was best expressed once by one of my own children, who when she was four years old or so ran upstairs to tell me a guest was come. I asked her, "Is she a Chinese lady or an American?" The child opened her eyes very wide at me and replied in astonishment, "I don't know. I didn't ask."

It is not however about internationalism that I wish to speak tonight. In the first place, I am not really an internationalist, I am a nationalist. I do not believe in a future Utopia where the nations shall become one, when all people will speak the same language, live in the same kind of houses, wear the same clothes, have the same culture, even have the same laws and type of civilization. To me the world would be immeasurably poorer and life far less rich, if this were true.....

Therefore I would like to see the Chinese thoroughly himself, as I would like to see the American thoroughly himself, or the Englishman, and so with all peoples. I believe each people can contribute most to the world when he is most thoroughly himself, an expression of his own history, his own race, his own culture. In fact, I am an ardent nationalist, and believe in my own country. I have the great advantage of having more than one country, and therefore I am an ardent Chinese nationalist and an American nationalist, and I find no confusion in myself, having my dual nationalisms founded in an equal respect for both my countries, as one respects both father and mother. If America is my motherland and gave me her body, China is my fatherland and gave me his spirit and his mind. My heart they share.....

The first half of my life was spent entirely in old China. The old traditions are my traditions, even as they are yours. I learned the ethics of Confucius. I was taught how a girl should behave in the home and what her place in life should be. I was taught old fashioned courtesy and conventionalized speech. I lived among country people and among city people, with ignorant and with learned, for twenty-seven years. During these years I cannot remember that I knew at all beyond perhaps mere acquaintance, and I cannot remember even that a single Chinese who had been abroad or who spoke English beyond a few words learned in school. The last thirteen years I have lived in a city where congregate for many purposes hundreds of modern Chinese. My neighbours, my friends, my associates today are three-fourths of them modern Chinese who have been abroad, who speak English, French, German, Italian, Russian, who know more about the literatures of the West than I do, who know more about the life of those countries than I do, whose demands are far more western than mine; who eat more western food, speak more in a foreign tongue, live in a more western manner, than I do myself. The contrast between the first twenty-seven years of my life and the last thirteen could not be more sharp than it is, and this contrast I have observed with keenest sympathy and interest.

To me the old China had and has, for it is not past, nor do I believe it is passing, its inestimable value. For dignity of living, the old China is unequalled. There is a very noble pride about the old Chinese. The modern China has equally my admiration. When I consider how during these troubled years, when wars within and without have harassed; when there has been one of the greatest famines of history, when problems of social change and of the formation of a new type of government in an enormous country have presented complications beyond the imagination; when world conditions have been such as to drive foreign nations to selfish and self-protection policies, in such times there has been steady progress in China. Air lines and roads, development in building, improvement in health measures, in provincial and national government, and many other less obvious improvements have been going on in constructive development. I never come back to China from abroad without thinking with the utmost satisfaction, "Here is a nation homogeneous and mature and self-aware in every sound and natural way. Everything is possible in the future." I have every confidence in modern and young China. To me the common man and woman of China is the most noble in the world. I know them. I know their lives, their joys, their sufferings. I respect them with all my heart. Some of my truest, warmest friends have been among them—women who couldn't read a letter, but who were noble and unselfish, simple and good, living life the best they knew and therefore superior to all those who know better and do not do it. Let no one of us dare to despise one of the common people.

BANDRA.

With a population of 41,189 inhabitants in an area of 3.3 square miles, Bandra can still maintain its boast that it is one of the healthiest suburbs of Bombay. Vital statistics for last year, which have been prepared by the Municipality, show that the death rate was as low as 11.94 per 1,000 inhabitants.

There was not a single case of cholera, plague or influenza in the town during 1933. The only epidemic disease that spoiled the clean record was small-pox. It appeared at Bandra, last January, when it had assumed a virulent epidemic form in Bombay. Special preventive measures were taken by the Municipality as a result of which there were in all only 22 attacks and seven deaths.

The mortality from malaria was very low, there being only two deaths during the year, as compared with ten in the previous year. Respiratory diseases including pneumonia and phthises, took a toll of 143 lives, the figure being higher than that of any other group.

The birth rate was nearly twice the death-rate, 926 births being registered during the year or 22.48 per 1,000 of the population. The infantile death rate per 1,000 births registered was 151.19. More than two-thirds of this infant mortality was in the first four weeks of life, 61 or 43.57 per cent dying in the first week, and 20 or 14.29 per cent dying in the age period of one to four weeks. Of the 926 babies, 477 were males and 449 females.—Times of India.

NON-EUROPEANS AND DRINK.

A deputation from the Native Races and the Liquor Traffic United Committee waited upon the Colonial Secretary, Sir Philip Cunliffe-Lister, at the Colonial Office.

Lord Rhayader, who introduced the deputation, and Major Richard Rigg, the chairman of the Executive Committee, who presented the case, urged that as the importation of spirits into West-Africa was lower than it had ever been, it presented an opportunity to do away with the traffic among the native races. They stressed the fact that the House of Commons as far back as 1888, and three successive Colonial Ministers had recognized that the liquor traffic among the native races was an evil. The committee had in their ranks many who were not abstainers, but who realized the harmful effects of spirits upon native peoples.

Rev. H. Cullen Young, representing the Church of Scotland and the Religious Tract Society, said that he had lived for many years in East Africa. He had been editor of a vernacular newspaper, and found that the natives were very observant, and were watching closely the actions of his Majesty's Government. The natives there could never understand why the selling of spirits in West Africa was tolerated while in East Africa heavy penalties were enforced for so doing.

Rev. G. L. Brander, of the Presbyterian Church of England, said one could not help feeling that the large increase of licences in Palestine since the war, and the fact that women have been introduced into licensed premises to serve and for entertainment purposes, suggested a lack of adequate supervision in the handling of the traffic. With a population who by virtue of their religion are forbidden to take intoxicants, one feels that this traffic should be discouraged by Britain as the Mandatory Power, and he was glad to learn that the Palestine Government intended to restrict the issue of licences, and introduce other reforms.

Sir Philip Cunliffe-Lister said, that in his opinion, which was borne out by statistics, drunkenness was negligible in Palestine, and the licensing of premises for the sale of liquor was subject to much more control and supervision than the deputation appeared to realize. He doubted whether it would be practicable to take away from the municipalities this small source of revenue, but he would mention the suggestion to the High Commissioner. With regard to West Africa, whatever might have been the case in the past, it was certainly not the case that the importation of spirits presented any serious social problem today, and he could not afford to forego a material source of revenue unless there were strong practical reasons. The problem which really was acute was illicit distillation on a large scale. The local Governments in the Gold Coast and Nigeria were becoming seriously alarmed by the spread of this evil. The problem was causing the greatest concern, both to him and to the Colonial Governments and the Governor of the Gold Coast was at present consulting responsible native opinion in order to ascertain their views as to the most effective policy to pursue to combat the evil.—The Christian World.

CHILDREN IN JAPAN.

Intimation has been received of the enactment of a law in Japan for the protection of children from ill-treatment and employment in certain occupations harmful to their moral or physical development.

When the bill was drafted by the Japanese Bureau of Social Affairs, two years ago, a difficulty was anticipated in the enforcement, as interference with parental rights is contrary to Japanese tradition. The need for legal protection had, however, already been felt for some time, for, on account of the rapid industrialisation of the country and the consequent change in the social structure, the number of destitute and ill-treated children had increased. Moreover, since the coming into force of the Reformatory Act in 1900 (which provided that, when the governors of prefectures consider it necessary, delinquent children under fourteen years of age may be taken into reformatories and may stay there until the age of twenty-one) and the Juvenile Court Law in 1923, closer attention had been paid to the causes underlying juvenile delinquency which were often found to be ill-treatment in childhood, neglect, illegitimacy, poverty, bad neighbourhood, etc.

So far there had been no uniformity in dealing with cases of ill-treatment of children. Ten prefectures had rules for the proper treatment of children which were enacted to prevent cruelty on the part of foster parents. In the rest of the provinces, it was left to the police to admonish guardians or parents and to inform the Prevention Society when children had to be taken away from home.

The following are the main provisions of the new Act:

"When parents or guardians ill-treat or neglect children under fourteen years of age, the prefectural authorities may place such children under the care of the private family or a suitable institution.

"The prefectural authorities may also, in appropriate cases, order children to be returned to their parents or guardians.

"Children must not be employed for the exhibition of deformities, or as beggars, or to accompany beggars. The prefectural authorities may prohibit or restrict the employment of children in circuses, acrobatic or similar performances, street or house-to-house trading, dancing, or waiting at table, or in other occupations liable to cause injury to their moral or physical development.

"Any person who contravenes the provisions of the Act will be liable to imprisonment not exceeding one year or a fine not exceeding 500 Yen."

The House of Peers has adopted a recommendation urging the Government to enforce this Act vigorously.

Rural Reconstruction:—The Associated Press understands that the committee formed a few days ago at a conference called in Calcutta by Sir Daniel Hamilton to formulate a scheme of rural reconstruction, have finished their labours. The scheme was further discussed, and adopted by the Committee. It has been decided to start institutes at the Gosaba and Mayurbhunj estates of Sir Daniel Hamilton and at Birnagar (Nadia), the estate of Rai Bahadur N. N. Banerjee. Work will commence simultaneously at Gosaba and Birnagar. Both Sir Daniel and the Rai Bahadur have arranged to provide the institutes with necessary building and funds to start with. Rai Bahadur N. N. Banerjee has contributed Rs. 1,000 to the permanent fund. The scheme provides for one year's allround practical training in farming and in some small industries to be imparted by an efficient staff, both stipendiary and honorary, with a view to infusing a spirit of self-help and co-operation among the students. The students, according to the scheme, must be of good physique and not less than fifteen years of age—the maximum age being fixed at 22. Preference will be given to literate candidates by the Selection Committee. The candidate will be regarded as a co-operative colonist with 20 bighas of land, a hut and a tank at the end of the course provided he can subscribe Rs. 200 to the initial capital required.

NOTES

The Late Mr. A. Rangaswami Aiyengar :—The death of Mr. A. Rangaswami Aiyengar, editor of the Hindu, after a short illness on Sunday came as a great shock to the public. To those who were privileged to enjoy his friendship, it came as a personal calamity. During recent years Rangaswami had come to occupy a position in many respects unique. At the time of his death he was perhaps the only public man in India who was in a position to mediate with any hope of success between Government and Gandhiji. He was deeply devoted to Gandhiji personally; at the same time he enjoyed the confidence of the Government of India to a considerable degree owing to his mastery of important constitutional problems and the completely unbiassed mind which he brought to bear upon them. The messages of regret and sympathy which have been sent by the Secretary of State, the Joint Committee and the Viceroy and other high officials of the Government of India and the universal appreciation in the British and Indian press attest to the remarkable position which he occupied in Indian public life at the time of his death. Rangaswami's eminence is only partially due to his editorship of the Hindu. The foundations of the greatness of that paper were laid and it had been largely developed into the great organ that it has become under his predecessors. It is as a statesman rather than as a journalist that Rangaswami will be missed. Had he lived he would certainly have been called to one of the principal ministerial positions in the Federal Government where his great grasp and detailed knowledge would have been invaluable. We offer our deepest condolences to his family.

Tagore on Gandhi :—Dr. Rabindranath Tagore takes Gandhiji too literally when he feels obliged to expose the fallacy of connecting the earthquake in Bihar with the practice of untouchability in its worst form in Malabar. Gandhiji has himself explained in the Harijan the many implied qualifications underlying his apparently absolute declaration of belief. Even without his explanation, those who have followed Gandhiji's career can easily see that he feels intensely when he feels at all and likes to express himself in the strongest language he can think of. Whether it is the thumb-impression or the three pound tax in South Africa, an excessive increase of the land assessment in Gujarat or the salt tax, when he is engaged in fighting against it, he sees it as the greatest of sins. When other people would be content to call an order or a system mistaken or even evil, he calls it Satanic. At the present time, Gandhiji is engaged in removing untouchability from the Hindu social system. The earthquake in Bihar may or may not be God's punishment for untouchability—the orthodox may hold with rather more plausibility that it is a punishment, for the attempt to break it—but if the natural phenomenon is made to lend support to the social movement, some good will be got out of the evil. This is a very ancient method which has the sanction of prophets in all lands. After all, no one is obliged to believe it, if he thinks that a just and omniscient Deity would not avenge the wrongs of Nayadis of Malabar on the mothers and infants of Monghyr and Muzaffarpur, and the God of Love would have other means of saving sinners and sinned alike from social and spiritual depression. It is not known that a single temple has been thrown open to the untouchables on account of Gandhiji's abjuration: on the other hand, the anti-untouchability Bill has been further postponed till August.

A Sisyphean Constitution :—While the White Paper and the Joint Parliamentary Committee have decided to divide British India into eleven separate, statutory provinces, proposals are being officially and non-officially made to establish various Central Boards to co-ordinate provincial activities in the several provinces on Education, Public Health, and other departments. This is a wasteful and expensive method of ensuring co-ordination which is essential to the even progress of the whole country. These Central Boards involve the travelling of a number of officials and non-officials from distant parts of the country, at much expense of time and money. Continuous work is impossible and there is also the possibility of friction when units which normally function in complete independence meet occasionally for the purpose of evolving a common policy or programme. Lord Curzon introduced a system of Inspectors-General whose advice and even presence were often resented by the provinces. The new Central Boards will really be the old Inspectors-General writ large. Instead of one, there will be a dozen or fifteen for each Department governing over the country and coming in each other's way. We earnestly trust that it is yet not too late to undo the mischievous proposal to vivisection British India. The Bihar earthquake has shown that at a crisis, only the united efforts of the whole country can save any part of it.

Legislating about Names :—The Law Member of the Government of India mentioned as an objection to the Removal of Untouchability Bill now before the Legislative Assembly that it omitted among other things to indicate under which one of the main Hindu castes the untouchables should be included for legal purposes, when untouchability was removed. This point did not present any difficulty to Mr. Justice Anantakrishna Aiyar of the Madras High Court who recently decided that untouchables being Hindus were Sudras and that the Hindu law of marriage applicable to Sudras applies to them. Mr. Ranga Iyer does not seem to have noticed this case. He has given notice of a Bill to declare that untouchables when they cease to be untouchable shall be regarded as Sudras. Mr. B. V. Jadhav has given notice of another Bill to abolish the recognition of Hindu castes by Government and to call all Hindus "Brahmans" in courts of law. So if Mr. Ranga Iyer's Bill promotes Harijans to Sudras, Mr. Jadhav's Bill is at the door waiting to make them Brahmins. Mr. Jadhav has paid the highest tribute to the Brahmins by his proposal.

India and the Anglo-Indians :—The current number of the Journal of the East India Association contains an interesting report of a speech by Sir Henry Gidney at a discussion meeting of the Association. Sir Henry objecting to the anomalous position of the Anglo-Indians, said, "For economic purposes we are called statutory natives of India and as such we are expected to work amicably with our Indian fellow workmen. Suddenly a railway strike develops.....The Anglo-Indian and domiciled European employed on the railway (still classed statutory Indian) has to don his uniform, and turn out as a member of the Auxiliary Force to quell the disturbance, but by doing so he is suddenly metamorphosed into a European British subject." Sir Henry Gidney, however, in this very speech has himself contributed to such a confusion. In the first place, he demands preferential treatment from the British Government, as, for instance, when he refers to "the price" that the community has had to pay for loyalty to the King and Empire; and at the same time, asks that the Anglo-Indian be regarded as an Indian for the purposes of Indianisation of the services. Sir Henry concluded his speech with a plea that the "safeguards" allowed to Europeans in the White Paper scheme be also extended to his own community because "the Anglo-Indian owing to his adherence to all that is British and Western and his loyalty is also considered alien and a foreigner." The last reason advanced by Sir Henry, the loyalty of the Anglo-Indian, is untenable since there are Indians who have been even more "loyal" than the Anglo-Indian and yet do not ask for safeguards as a community. As for his adherence to all that is British and Western, we are glad to observe Sir Henry's recent admonitions on his return to India, to his community to regard themselves as sons of India. This is a surer method of stabilising the Anglo-Indian's position than by seeking "safeguards" from the British Government.

Animal Protection in Germany :—Commenting some time back on the new law relating to the protection of animals contemplated by the Hitler Government in Germany, Progress Today, the anti-vivisection organ of Britain, regretted that an earlier order forbidding vivisection in Prussia had been modified. The current issue of that journal contains the full text in translation of the new German law which has come into force from the first of this month. The act has left the vivisectionists practically free to perform their experiments in allowing them "only when they promise useful results not hitherto attained or serve to elucidate an unsolved problem and provided infliction of pain, not necessary for the purpose of the experiment, be avoided." Apart from the anti-vivisectionist's point of view, however, the act has some curious provisions. The clause forbidding the tearing or ripping off of the legs of living frogs is likely to convey to an outsider the impression that this is a favourite pastime in Germany.

between the illustrious rulers who are held in universal respect because of their concern for the true welfare of their subjects manifested in their administration and the disreputable ones who live only to gratify their whims and fancies. The suggestion that a Commission appointed by His Majesty the King Emperor be set up to enquire into the condition of the people in the States, has been made. We do not see how the Princes whose loyalty is unquestioned, can object to it. There is another matter to which attention should be called. At the Special States Peoples' Conference held at Delhi last week, a lady speaker complained that the hard condition of women in the States had not been referred to in the President's address. The All-India Women's Conference is to meet in Bombay next March. We commend the subject to its urgent and earnest consideration.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1934.

STATES PROBLEMS.

The Indian States Protection Bill now before a Select Committee of the Legislative Assembly is thoroughly misconceived. It will not protect the States. It will not protect even the Princes who, in the eyes of Government as in their own, are the States. What it will really do is to isolate the States and their rulers and make their destinies wholly dependent on the goodwill of the Political Department of the Government of India which, in the White Paper constitution, is to be directly administered by the Governor-General. That Department, if it continues to adhere to the dictum of the present Home Member, Sir Harry Haig, that the States are and must remain autocracies, will accelerate the doom which other autocracies have called down upon themselves. The fact that Dictatorship rather than Democracy is the fashion nowadays has no bearing on the issue so far as it concerns autocracy in Indian States. The Dictator must have no superior either to protect or punish him. The very idea of a Dictator who needs protection from a stronger power is a contradiction. The ruler of an Indian State no doubt exercises dictatorial powers but he does so by sufferance of the Paramount Power and can be prevented from doing so by the same Power. It can require and has in very recent cases required him to hand over his authority to its own nominee as his Chief Minister nominally, but really as a Dictator not only over his people but over himself and every member of his family; it can request him to take a holiday out of his territories and can command unquestioning compliance; it can, without his application and without his permission, send its troops to put down disorder in his State.

We are bound to acknowledge that the intervention of the Paramount Power in every recent case has, according to the testimony of States subjects themselves, resulted in immediate relief in respect of their most urgent grievances. The appointment of British officers to chief ministerial positions in the disturbed States, has almost miraculously resulted in their instant pacification. One may be inclined to think that this was due to the consciousness of the irresistible might of the Paramount Power but this writer, from recent conversations with people directly concerned, found that this was not the case. In one State, the English Minister won over the people almost as soon as he assumed charge of the administration by repealing an irksome order which had long been in force, forbidding peasants to kill wild animals which ravaged their crops by severe penalties. The prosecution and conviction of a dissolute favourite who had been terrorising the people, restored public confidence and rallied public opinion to the support of the administration, in another. The presence of an English officer by itself exercised, one was told, a restraining effect on Princes who were unaccustomed to exercise restraint on their impulses in the pursuit of pleasures. Apparently, Indian Ministers had no corresponding moral influence on the Princes concerned or did not try to exercise it. The aversion felt at the appointment of British Ministers to Indian rulers in British India is, it is astonishing to learn, not shared by the people of the States who on the other hand see in it the only means of immediate relief from their most pressing burdens. There is plenty of nationalist feeling among the subjects of States, but naturally they attach more importance to improvements in everyday administration. A very curious practice in some of the cotton growing States, does not seem to be generally known. Ginning and Pressing which is an indispensable preliminary to bringing cotton to the market, is a monopoly either held directly by the State or leased to some financier. In either case, heavy fees are charged at the few factories maintained in the State, and cultivators are obliged to get their cotton ginned at heavy rates in these alone, although they may have to convey it over long distances while there may be factories much nearer at which the operation is more cheaply performed just outside the State limits. A friend calculated that on account of this practice which in some cases is aggravated by a heavy export duty, the cultivator gets less than a third of the price which his cotton fetches in Bombay.

The Government of India will not interfere to protect the cultivator. It must wait till the discontent swells into a disturbance sufficiently serious to justify its placing the administration under a Minister of its choice with whose orders the Prince will not be allowed to interfere. This is typical of the present situation in the States, with the exception of a dozen at the most. What the people of the States want is really that they should have the same amenities, such as they are, which their kith and kin in British India enjoy. This writer was astonished to be told not once or twice in Northern India that if a plebiscite were taken 80 percent of States subjects would vote straight for annexation to British India. Fifteen years ago, this would have been a rare thing to be said of the States people. But now a great change seems to have come over them. It is no doubt due partly to the contagion of constitutional demands in British India. To some extent it is due to a few Princes—a very small number—misbehaving in ways which can only be characterised as outrageous. Much is said of the gutter press. But what of the rulers who, if a tenth of what has been publicly alleged against them is true, have behaved as no gutter urchin would think of behaving? The great defect of the Protection Bill is that it makes no distinction

[Feb. 10

INDIAN STATES AND PUBLIC OPINION.—II*

(By K. NATARAJAN.)

Sir Harry Haig, in the Assembly discussion on the Princes Protection Bill, stated that the States represented that the present law was no real safeguard for them. We are not told which of the States represented that the present law was no real safeguard for them. We are entitled to ask the question. The present law itself was passed in response, it was said, to a demand from the Princes. But I have heard it from the lips of one of the biggest of them that His Highness had not only not wanted it but was actually opposed to it. There were no doubt others also who did likewise. In the Legislative Assembly's proceedings, the debate on the States (Protection) Bill is preceded by the discussion on the Cotton Industry Protection (Amendment) Bill. Before this Bill was drafted, careful enquiries were made by the Tariff Board as to whether the Industry deserved protection or not. Was any enquiry made as to whether the States which were dissatisfied with the existing law and asked for more drastic ones, deserved to get what they wanted? The progressive States are most unlikely to seek protection at the hands of the Indian Legislature. They are quite able to protect themselves and, as a matter of fact, no Indian newspaper ventures to criticise them. The States which demand protection are the badly administered States. In the case of many of them timely criticism, even if a little violent, would help them to pull themselves up before they are confronted with a Commission of Enquiry. In the eleven years since the Act of 1922 has been in force, there have been more cases of States which had to be sharply called to order by the Paramount Power than in any corresponding period previously. I need not mention names as they are familiar to all. The present law designed to protect the States have landed several of them in humiliation and disaster. The latest case is not without a comic side to it. The ruler left his State and sought and found medical advice and spiritual solace in Pondicherry, of all places, for his maladies. In vain, the Viceroy entreated him to return to his State. The ruler has started a "fast unto death," of the progress of which the country is kept duly informed from time to time. But he refuses to come. The Government of India may in the near future have to enter into extradition treaties with neighbouring foreign states to get truant Princes back to their States, if the present Bill becomes law. That the Indian States, (with notable exceptions) have tended to become more autocratically governed than before the War, is a fact which he who runs may read. The reasons for this are many and complex. In Mr. Lloyd George's "War Memoirs" the ex-Premier casually mentioned that when he was Minister of Munitions and a new gun called Stoke's Gun was rejected by the War office, he was enabled to demonstrate its value by experiments carried out with a sum of £ 20,000 which he had received "from one of the Indian Maharajahs to be expended by me on whatever war purpose seemed to me most useful for the Empire." (p. 619. Vol II). It is not stated whether the Government of India were aware and approved of this private transaction with a British Minister. I refer to it as an authenticated instance of the tendency to which I referred, of rulers to become more autocratic and irresponsible since the War. One of the most marked features of autocracy is its impatience of criticism. The Government of India passed a Press Act in 1922 to humour the Princes. It was practically thrust upon them as shown by the fact that the Act has practically remained a dead letter—there have been only three prosecutions under it.

Sir Harry Haig in his speech in introducing the present Bill gave some reasons for the little use that has been made of the Act, which must strike people who are better informed in these matters, as far-fetched. These are, that prosecution is a slow process; it gives added publicity to the allegations complained of; there is nothing to prevent the publisher or the writer from indulging in his offence during the pendency of the prosecution; and finally when a conviction is obtained, there is no assurance that the person convicted is the real offender. These are incidental to every system which has a judicial basis. "Off with his head, so much for Buckingham", represents a more expeditious method. After all, justice is not more expeditious in Indian States than in British India. In any case, the Home Department is responsible for the speedy administration of justice, and the Press should not be made to suffer for the faults of that Department. Are there enough judges to cope with the work of the Courts? Delayed justice is a greater hardship to the people and the journalists, than to Princes, and we shall all be grateful to the Home Member if he can devise suitable measures to speed it up.

The reasoning of the Home Member would justify the abolition of all Courts of Justice in the land and their replacement by Star Chambers whose proceedings are swift and secret. The greatest benefit conferred by British rule, Ranade thought, was the substitution of the Rule of Law for the personal rule of Hindu and Muslim sovereigns. We have declined during recent years from the rule of law to the rule of ordinance, and if the Home Member's reasoning reflects the official mind, we may find ourselves once again back to the personal rule of Indian rulers. British India instead of helping to advance the States will have itself retrograded to the States' system. It will be one more proof that benefits which we have not secured by our own exertions have no permanence and are enjoyed only on sufferance. "The Lord gave, the Lord has taken away, blessed be the name of the Lord."

I am not an indiscriminating believer in what is called the freedom of the Press. Writing is, in the words of a great writer, a noble, a difficult art. It is also unfortunately a much neglected art. But there is this to be said, that the writer who flings about words without thought of their relevance, justice and truth to fact, although he may make a splash for a short while, seldom leaves a permanent impression or opinion. Readers soon learn to appraise his words at their true value. Sunlight and open air are great destroyers of noxious life, and the abuses of freedom of the Press carry with them their own corrective. Far more formidable and poisonous in their effect are propaganda which "without utterance save the shrug or sigh, deal round to happy fools their speechless obloquy." I have often suggested to influential friends that each State should have a semi-official organ to correct misrepresentation and keep the public acquainted with the objects and results of administrative measures. But though they all agreed that it would be a good thing, none has been able to give effect to the suggestion. The fact is, and it is one which fair-minded commentators ought to keep in view, that the States are not always in a position to explain or justify publicly the purpose or reason of all their measures. A newspaper organ of their own is, therefore, likely to be an embarrassment rather than a help to them. In these circumstances, His Highness the Maharajah of Bikaner has set an example which other Princes may copy. His Highness has publicly contradicted an allegation in some unnamed newspaper that he had written a letter to the Viceroy suggesting some of the recent repressive measures. The Maharajah unequivocally denies that he wrote such a letter. Some one referred to blackmailing. It is a despicable offence but no special law is needed to bring offenders to book. His Majesty the King the other day prosecuted a man in the ordinary courts for trying to blackmail him, and I do not see why the Princes should not follow his august example.

Sir Harry Haig indicated in another surprising passage of his speech that the duty of setting things right in the States, was the exclusive monopoly of the Paramount Power. "It may sometimes be said," he observed, "that there may be in certain States misgovernment of a scandalous and intolerable kind which justifies and demands interference from outside. Well, Sir, if those conditions arise, my answer is that we cannot allow such interference to be organised by irresponsible people in British India. There is a constitutional way of effecting that interference; it can be done by the action of the Paramount Power, recognised by constitutional practice." As an argument against organising jathas, this has some force. But even there, the jathas may be the only means of awakening the Paramount Power to its duty to the people of the States. Modern Governments assume that all is well in their administration, unless people agitate, organise and otherwise make it impossible for governments to rest in this assumption. Newspaper criticism is the mildest form of agitation, and in this country with its vast mass of illiteracy which is much greater in most of the States, it is also the most harmless kind of agitation. We recognise that the Paramount Power is the sole authority to call rulers of States to account in the last resort, but criticism in the Press and on platforms may often obviate the necessity of its intervention after maladministration has reached the magnitude of a scandal.

The States' Protection Bill contains provisions not only for controlling the Press, but also to punish conspiracy to overawe the Administration of a State by criminal force or show of it. To this provision, no reasonable person can object provided that the law is carefully defined and limited to attempts of this objectionable character. The provision relating to jathas, which are meant as peaceful demonstrations, seems to be indefensible. The risk of such demonstrations breaking out in violence, should be averted by suitable police vigilance in the States rather than in British India. The general power which Government propose to take to prevent agitation within British India with the object of interference with the administration of the States, is replete with serious possibilities. "Interference" is a vague term which may cover trivial matters, and so is causing disturbance of public tranquility in a State. The Bill purports to place the States in possession of the same protection as the Government of British India enjoys. But this ignores an important difference. The administration of British India is carried on in the name of a democracy. Although as a rule it is content to leave matters to men on the spot, it may wake up some day and call its agents to account. The possibility of this is more remote in the case of the States, and, therefore, the incidence of the same laws may be different in the British India and the States. These, however, are points on which members of the Conference will speak with more knowledge and experience than myself. I have, therefore, dwelt largely on the Bill as it affects journalism of which I have some experience. I have had to prepare this address in a very short time, and that is another reason why I could not do more than make a passing reference to other matters.

THE PROBLEM OF THE SAAR.

(By BERTRAM PICKARD.)

The Saar Basin is a densely populated and highly industrialised triangle of territory between present Germany and Lorraine. It is first and foremost a coal field with important metal and glass industries dependent upon the mines. For a quarter of a century (1792-1815) it was under French domination. Otherwise, with the exception of one town (Saarlouis) it has been German soil for a thousand years, with strong German sympathies and is almost exclusively of German tongue.

Nevertheless, as the result of a determined effort by Clemenceau and his friends at the Peace Conference to annex, and failing that to control, the Saar, Germany was obliged, under the Treaty of Versailles, to hand over to France the coal mines of Saar as compensation for the destruction of mines in northern France, and to surrender the government of the territory to the trusteeship of the League for a period of fifteen years. At the end of the fifteen years (i. e., before January 10, 1935) it was fixed to hold a plebiscite by which the population is to decide whether they would like to: (a) remain under the League's administration; (b) be reunited with Germany; c) be united with France.

The government of the Saar by the League's Commission has been very far from satisfactory. The local population resented its arbitrary fate from the first, and no doubt complicated greatly the work of the Commission. But unfortunately the Commission, at any rate between 1920-1926, failed lamentably to create the impression that its work was being carried out in the spirit of a temporary trust, with the result, that there was constant friction between the Commission and the local population.

The position improved somewhat after the signature of the Treaty of Locarno, and there was every hope until the rise of National-Socialism in Germany that the plebiscite would easily be organised and that the Saar would return to German sovereignty, an amicable arrangement being come to as between the French and German Governments for the repurchase of the mines by the latter.

The advent of Hitler however, created an entirely new situation. The people of the Saar were naturally deeply influenced by the Nazi Revolution. But being outside the jurisdiction of the Reich, the opponents of Hitlerism were left relatively immune except for a violent agitation against them which the Commission has quite naturally been compelled to resist.

The question now is can a free plebiscite be organised that is worthy of the name? And if so what, if anything, can be done to protect those elements of the population—and particularly certain officials—whose past co-operation with the League's regime will certainly be regarded as villainy by the Nazis in the event of a pro-German vote.

Because of these obvious dangers and difficulties it is suggested in some quarters that it would be consistent with the spirit of its trusteeship for the League to postpone the plebiscite pending definite undertaking by the German Government to refrain from political persecutions in the Saar in the event of the territory's return to Germany.

But there are obvious difficulties in such a policy. First it would, in effect, be an intervention in German internal politics. Second, it would increase the already violent hostility towards the League amongst wide circles in Germany which have always believed that the League's control of the Saar was a disguised attempt by France to annex the territory.

The task of the League Council in this dilemma is a thorny one.

A MODERN POLITICAL PARADOX.

(BY RECLUSE.)

Speaking before the Historical Association at King's College, London, Professor Gilbert Murray recently characterised present-day civilisation as one 'full of humane ideas and scientific knowledge about politics and government, yet pierced by savage discontent and in places brutally misgoverned; wealthy, yet full of extreme poverty; enlightened, yet bristling with fashionable superstitions.' Indeed it is very interesting to study this political paradox which the modern world presents to an average student of the science. So far as political theory was concerned, it was believed up to the last world war that parliamentary democracy was the ideal type of government to which all states gravitated. But a careful study of the posture of present-day political affairs, however, brings into bold relief the fact that democracy as a political creed is at its lowest ebb. Indeed the set-back which democracy has received since the war is so severe that unless one is a great optimist in regard to the ultimate destiny of mankind, one will not be prepared to lay a wager for the successful restoration of Democracy on his erstwhile throne. Even great intellectuals like George Bernard Shaw show in their recent published works that they have lost faith in modern democracy. Yet it must be recognised that it is the only political institution which satisfies the natural aspirations of man and secures the greatest good of the greatest number. In this connection it is interesting to note the recent resolution passed by the British Labour Party pinning its faith in Democracy. The resolution declares that the party bases its appeal to the public on far-reaching economic and social changes which it hopes to bring about by a democratic government, in a free electoral system and an active and efficient parliamentary machine. At a time when dictatorship is the order of the day, this resolution must be considered a very welcome sign.

The question, however, arises as to why such a noble creed has gone to the wall. The answer to this question is obvious and must be sought in the iconoclastic tendencies of the world events following the last war.

A successful democracy always postulates a close contact between the rulers and the ruled. Wherever this contact was obtainable as in ancient City States, democracy not only succeeded but became the only form of government. That is perhaps the reason why the Greek philosophers proposed a definite population basis for their City States. It is true that there is a limit to this contact at present owing to the sheer impossibility of bringing together the vast populations of a modern state, and except perhaps in its mountain stronghold in Switzerland, democracy in its unadulterated and pure form has never existed since the time of the Greeks. Such contact as is possible was, however, sought to be maintained until the last war by means of wider franchise broadbased on adult suffrage and in proportion to the proximity of this contact the success or failure of democratic institutions was gauged. Unfortunately after the War, modern governments have assumed more responsibilities and functions than they used to do before, as a result of which their hands are too full to allow them to attend to the primary duties of democracies. Another factor which has retarded the successful working of the democratic institutions is the complicated nature of the various problems that face modern governments.

Trade depression of a colossal nature, unemployment, breakdown of currency and exchange mechanism, War debts, reparations—these and similar problems which are the direct legacy of the War are engrossing the minds and attention of modern statesmen. It is true that democracy throws up the right type of man but it must also be said in fairness that it creates fissiparous tendencies in the body politic. Parliamentary Democracy, with its corollary the party system, inheres within itself a constant warfare of principles. In such a state of affairs it is simply impossible to solve the tangled skein of present-day problems. In this connection the recent history of Great Britain easily comes to mind. Before the national government came into existence, the Tory and Labour Governments in turn tried to grapple with the several questions that faced the country single-handed but it was soon discovered that unless the talents and resources of the whole nation were pooled together the stupendous problems like unemployment, industrial and commercial recovery could not be solved. It was also noticed at the time that in the absence of a clear solution of these many-sided difficulties Britain would lose ground. This gave rise to the present national Government. Elsewhere as in Italy and Germany even the parliamentary form of government was thrown overboard. Hitlerism, Fascism are not only the order of the day but bid fair to tow the whole world in their line. To all appearances, the benevolent autocracy of the 17th and the 18th centuries has again raised its head under a different name, and although it must be admitted that these modern phases have done considerable good to the countries concerned, they contain within themselves the seeds of their destruction. The lesson of history is evident and it is bound to repeat itself. The dictatorship of the modern type is but a passing phase and the pendulum is bound to oscillate to the old position.

It is no doubt an irony that the war which was declared to have been waged to make the world safe for democracy should have loosened forces reactionary and almost destructive of democracy itself. Out of evil cometh good. Although democracy is tottering and is on its last legs in some countries, inter-nationalism has won the day and today the world is closer than it was before the war. In their adversity, nations seek counsel in international conferences and bring their difficulties to the world forum for solution. The secession of Japan and Germany from the League of Nations may naturally cause anxiety with regard to its future but this much is certain that the common adversities have tended to breed an international outlook in the peoples of the world and therein lies the safety and strength of mankind.

Indian Dentist in U. S.:—Dr. Mahamed Sulaiman, a dentist living here, has become a citizen of the United States after a struggle lasting eight years in the courts. He came to the United States from Calcutta in 1904 and graduated from the Chicago College of Dental Surgery. In 1919 he was granted final papers of naturalization by the judge at Chicago, but a few years later Congress passed an act barring Hindus from citizenship. Nothing was done to enforce the Act in Dr. Sulaiman's case until 1926 when he applied for a passport to go to India to visit his ailing father. In reply, he was informed by Washington that he was no longer an American citizen. He then took the case to court on the ground that the Act was not retrospective in effect.

SANSKRIT RESEARCH IN TRAVANCORE, (FROM OUR TRAVANCORE CORRESPONDENT.)

The Silver Jubilee Celebration of the Department for the Publication of Oriental Manuscripts, Travancore, took place at the Victoria Jubilee Town Hall, on January 28.

Sir C. P. Ramaswamy Iyer, Legal and Constitutional Adviser to His Highness the Maharajah of Travancore, presided.

Mr. K. Sambasiva Sastri, the Curator of the Department for the Publication of Oriental Manuscripts, Travancore, delivered the welcome address in the course of which he said that Maharajah Marthanda Varma (1729-1750) was a great warrior-statesman as he was the conqueror and consolidator of Travancore, but Maharaja Swathi Tirunal was a well known patron of art and letters, being himself a composer and singer in different Indian languages, Sanskrit, Marathi, Hindustani, Malayalam and Tamil. It was given to Sri Mulam Tirunal Maharaja (1885-1924) to have established a Department for the Publication of Oriental Manuscripts. He then dwelt upon the progress made by the first Curator, the late Mahamahopadhyaya Dr. T. Ganapathi Sastri of international reputation for Sanskrit learning.

In his introductory speech Sir C. P. Ramaswami Iyer said that the work of resuscitation and research has not evoked that amount of public interest which was expected. It was indeed a matter of sincere gratification to him to preside on the auspicious occasion which has coincided with the wedding of Her Highness the First Princess. The Department owes its existence to the kindly and generous interest evinced by His Highness the Maharaja Sri Mulam Tirunal of revered memory. It was generally the practice to take credit for the great and glorious heritage they had inherited. From his experience of antiquities, he could say that India had its own treasure in arts and culture. He had seen a temple in Kashmir in which there were seven gates dedicated to the seven planets, but five of which were in ruins. Among those Indian States which had done valuable work in the revival and resuscitation of Indian art and culture was Hyderabad which through its learned and patriotic citizen, Sir Akbar Hydari, was doing magnificent work in the restoration of Ajanta frescoes which was an inspiration to lovers of India. He regretted that there was not in India a sense of historical pride in its greatness. In the Paris Museum he has seen the gateway removed from Cambodia and Siam. He then made a survey of the ruins of Egypt, Syria and India and paid a high tribute of praise to Lord Curzon for his generosity in the revival of Indian monuments. What was required in India was a patriotic sense of practical action in the preservation of Indian art and culture as symbolised in the imperishable work of the past. The only Indian States, besides Hyderabad, where the work of preservation had been attempted were Baroda, Mysore and Travancore. In Kashmir Saiva literature was being preserved. Perhaps it was wise to confine attention to one ambit of support and preservation. Hyderabad symbolised Persian and Urdu culture of the times of old. Travancore deserves praise for bringing to light some of the priceless gems in Sanskrit literature which have won world-wide importance and renown and are considered international works throwing considerable light on many human problems of life and death. For instance the publication of Bhasa's dramatic works, has turned the attention of the savants in the two hemispheres to the treasure house of Sanskrit culture. Another work was Aryamanju srinula-kalpa which pertains to Buddhism. It was also, like Bhasa's Plays, unearthed in Travancore from a private library by Dr. Ganapathi Sastri. When Professor Sylvain Levi of Paris was addressed about the discovery of this work, he replied to say that he has come across only a Chinese translation of it and strongly recommended its publication. When it was published, Pandit K. P. Jayaswal, the famous historian and research scholar, extolled it on the ground that it embraces the Imperial History of India from 600 B. C. to 770 A. D. from (a) the time of the Buddha upto the Mauryas (b) the persecutors of the Buddhist religion (i. e., Pushyamitra) under the name of "Gomin" then (c) the revival—of Buddhism—a dynasty of two kings from Yaksha country identified with the two Kadphises (d) provincial histories and (e) Imperial history of Inner India. Mr. Jayaswal is decidedly of the opinion "that the treatment of Indian history from the Gupta time up to the Pala period has to be radically changed." This great scholar is now engaged in preparing a new history of India, based on Aryamanju srinula Kalpa, discovered in Travancore by the Department for the Publication of Oriental Manuscripts. Such has been the work turned out by Travancore. Sir C. P. Ramaswamy Iyer then enlarged on what is being done by the British Government in the way of the preservation of ancient works. He then disapproved of the idea of getting secondhand things and insisted on our people going into original works.

Mr. V. V. Srinivasa Iyengar, retired High Court Judge, Madras, on being called upon to address the meeting, said that every thing possible was being done in Travancore which always stood for culture and art. It was, therefore, auspicious that the celebration of the Silver Jubilee should take place synchronously with the marriage of the First Princess. He was a close observer of Travancore for the past 50 years and had always been struck with the part she has taken in the development of art and culture in this land of temples, charity and beauty—this land of Sri Parasurama. He conveyed his felicitations to the city on the international importance of the work it has been doing. Every home in Travancore was a treasure trove of valuable manuscripts. He appealed to the Department to carry on its investigations and enquiries. In conclusion he hoped that the Department would turn out more work under the auspices of His Highness the present Maharaja Sri Chittira Tirunal.

Mr. P. K. Narayana Pillai, retired High Court Judge and a member of the Council of management of the Department, regretted the parsimonious way in which Government spend money on the Department though it has issued a larger number of books than Baroda and Mysore at considerably less cost than those two States.

In bringing his concluding remarks to a close the Chairman reminded the audience that the Travancore Royal House was always reputed for its patronage of art and letters and hoped that, like Bhoja Raja of old, His Highness Sri Chittira Tirunal would show his wonted generosity in the preservation of art and culture.

With a vote of thanks proposed by Rao Sahib S. Parameswara Iyer, retired Devan Peishkar and a well known Sanskrit scholar, the proceedings were brought to a close.

realpEARTHQUAKE HAVOC IN NORTH BIHAR.

(Associated Press.)

The fact that even 18 days after the catastrophe the outside world has little conception of the appalling magnitude of the recent earthquake, is shown by the issue of an important statement by the Governor of Bihar. The attention of the public in India and abroad has hitherto been concentrated mainly on the necessity of providing immediate relief to the sufferers. The statement demonstrates that this part of the problem (which has now, as a result of splendid efforts on the part of the Government and independent relief units, been practically solved) is no more than a minute fraction of the whole, and that real difficulty arises over the task of reconstruction which has yet scarcely been approached and is stupendous.

The earthquake is now known to have been one of the greatest of which human records exist. The exact length of the epicentre (line on the surface immediately above the actual fracture in the earth's crust) is not at present certain, but there is likelihood that it stretches entire the way from Motihari to Monghyr, a distance of about 135 miles. It seems probable also that there is a second epicentre, beginning at the point near the middle of the first one and running at an angle to it in the direction of Purnea. No dislocation on anything like this scale has been recorded in any part of the world for decades.

The epicentres of the disastrous Japanese and New Zealand earthquakes in recent years were, I understand, not more than about twenty miles long. The nearest approach made to the size of the Bihar earthquake, within this century, was probably the great Californian earthquake.

After a catastrophe of this magnitude, it is inevitable that detailed information about it should take a long time to come in. This is so after all major earthquakes, owing to the destruction they wreak upon the communications, which on this occasion over an area of about fifteen thousand square miles, have practically ceased to exist. The situation has been further complicated by the geographical factor, hitherto insufficiently appreciated in other parts of India, namely that Bihar proper is completely bisected by the Ganges (here the immense annually-shifting stream is unbridged throughout its whole two-hundred mile course across the province) and that in consequence, the communication between North and South Bihar have always been bad, a journey from Patna to Muzaffarpur, only 35 miles away on the other side of the river, normally occupying about four-and-a-half hours. Possibilities even for contractors by aeroplane are strictly limited, as will be realised at once by anyone, who like myself has flown over the large parts of the devastated areas. Among such few natural landing grounds for small planes as are to be found in the densely cultivated rice growing country, several have been rendered quite unusable by floods resulting first, from the ejection of vast quantities of subterranean water from fissures and blowholes in the surface and secondly, from the recent heavy rains.

Although the death roll is now well over 6,000 and the number of injured very large, it is a matter for amazement to one who has clambered through choked streets of ruined towns and surveyed the shattered country side from air, that casualties were not vastly greater. The explanation is to be found in three facts. First, that the disaster occurred not at night but in the early afternoon, when the maximum number of people were up and about. Secondly that the actual duration of the shock, three minutes, was a good deal longer than in most of the world's big earthquakes, thus enabling more inhabitants to escape from houses before they collapsed. Third and the most important, that the area worst affected being entirely agricultural, a relatively very small proportion of the population occupied brick or masonry dwellings, a majority living in low roofed mud huts. In one of the big cities such as Cawnpore or Delhi, the number of dead alone would certainly have run into many tens and probably some hundreds of thousands.

The total population, however, of the area immediately above the actual seat of the disturbance, including five hundred thousand town dwellers, referred to in the Governor's statement, is about twelve millions and although the casualties among them, considering the magnitude of the convulsion, are light, it would be true to say that the lives of every one of these people have been deranged by the earthquake and that it will be months before existence for them can be restored to normal.

Probably the most impressive feature of the disaster, to one visiting the affected areas for the first time is not the smashed towns, but the astounding large scale alterations to the whole structure of the countryside. Over thousands of square miles of land is traversed by the enormous jagged fissures and filled with objects which, from the air look like small volcanic craters, from which circles of sand or grey mud have spread over the fields. The road and railway bridges are down in all directions and hundreds of miles of railway lines have been wrecked metals, in some places having been flung clean of the track. At one place I noticed an abandoned train standing in a station, the whole length of which was traversed by an enormous crack several feet wide. As the entire devastated area consists of flat alluvial land, large blocks of which have suffered vertical displacement of several inches if not feet, and have in several places already changed courses of streams, it seems certain that there will be extensive alterations in the drainage of the country when next the monsoon rains come down, resulting in disastrous flooding.

The general survey of the situation makes it perfectly clear that North Bihar has suffered one of the greatest natural calamities of human history and that many months, if not years, will be required together with enormous sums of money, before her prosperity can be restored.

THE EARTHQUAKE, PUNISHMENT OR CALAMITY?

1. GANDHIJI SEES DIVINE WRATH.

Mahatma Gandhi writes in Harijan:—

A friendly wire says, 'Will you not lay aside untouchability and go to Bihar?' An angry wire says, 'Must Mahatma fiddle while Bihar is burning?' Both the wires pay me an undeserved compliment and exaggerate my capacity for service as they assume that I can do more than my comrades. I have no such hallucination about my capacity. Rajendra Prasad is one of the best among my co-workers. He can command my services whenever he likes. The Harijan cause is as much his as it is mine, even as the cause of Bihar is as much mine as it is his. But God has summoned him to the Bihar relief as He has chosen the Harijan cause for me. When the call comes from Bihar, I hope I shall not be found wanting. Champaran discovered me when I was a mere wanderer. Babu Braj Kishore Prasad and his band of workers gave me their complete allegiance when India was wondering what place I had in her public life. I am tied to Bihar by sacred ties which are indissoluble. Therefore I need no spur to send me to Bihar. Perhaps I am serving her best by remaining at my post for the time being. All the world is directing her attention to the catastrophe. It would be presumption on my part to rush to Bihar when all are ready to assist her. Those also help who know how and when to wait.

But another wire says I must use the Harijan collections for Bihar relief. I think it would be a clear breach of trust on my part if I listened to the advice. We can not afford to be unnerved in the face of great calamities. Not all the riches of the world would restore Bihar to her original condition. Time must elapse before reconstruction takes place and things become normal. What is necessary is that those who have anything to give are induced to give the most, not the least, they can.

But I make bold to suggest that, in reconstructing life in Bihar, if the wisest use is to be made of the help that is being sent, the organisers would have resolutely to set their faces against reproducing evil customs and habits. They may not encourage untouchability or caste divisions unperceivably based on untouchability. Nature has been impartial in her destruction. Shall we retain our partiality—caste against caste, Hindu, Muslim, Christian, Parsee, Jew, against one another—in reconstruction, or shall we learn from her the lesson that there is no such thing as untouchability as we practise it to-day?

Tremendous responsibility rests both upon the Government and the unofficial agency as to how reconstruction is to be undertaken. And as both are working in cooperation for this purpose, it ought not to be difficult to rebuild Bihar in human and sanitary lines.

I share the belief with the whole world—civilized and uncivilized—that calamities such as the Bihar one come to mankind as chastisement for their sins. When that conviction comes from the heart, people pray, repent and purify themselves. I regard untouchability as such a grave sin as to warrant divine chastisement. I am not affected by posers such as 'why punishment for an age-old sin' or 'why punishment to Bihar and not to the South' or 'why an earthquake and not some other form of punishment'. My answer is: I am not God. Therefore I have but a limited knowledge of His purpose. Such calamities are not a mere caprice of the Deity or Nature. They obey fixed laws as surely as the planets move in obedience to laws governing their movement. Only we do not know the laws governing these events and, therefore, call them calamities or disturbances. Whatever, therefore, may be said about them must be regarded as guess work. But guessing has its definite place in man's life. It is an ennobling thing for me to guess that the Bihar disturbance is due to the sin of untouchability. It makes me humble, it spurs me to greater effort towards its removal, it encourages me to purify myself, it brings me nearer to my Maker. That my guess may be wrong does not affect the results named by me. For what is guess to the critic or the sceptic is a living belief with me, and I base my future actions on that belief. Such guesses become superstitions when they lead to no purification and may even lead to feuds. But such misuse of divine events cannot deter men of faith from interpreting them as a call to them for repentance for their sins. I do not interpret this chastisement as an exclusive punishment for the sin of untouchability. It is open to others to read in it divine wrath against many other sins.

Let anti-untouchability reformers regard the earthquake as a nemesis for the sin of untouchability. They cannot go wrong, if they have the faith that I have. They will help Bihar more and not less for that faith. And they will try to create an atmosphere against reproduction of untouchability in any scheme of reconstruction.

2. DR. TAGORE PROTESTS.

Dr. Rabindra Nath Tagore has issued the following statement through "United Press":—

It has caused me painful surprise to find Mahatma Gandhi accusing those who blindly follow their own social custom of untouchability for having brought down the God's vengeance upon certain parts of Bihar, evidently specially selected for his desolating displeasure. It is all the more unfortunate because this kind of unscientific and materialistic views of things are too readily accepted by large sections of our countrymen.

I keenly feel the indignity of it when I am compelled to utter the truism in asserting that physical catastrophes have their inevitable and exclusive origin in a certain combination of physical facts. Unless we believe in the inexorableness of universal laws in the working of which God himself never interferes imperilling thereby the integrity of His own creation we find it impossible to justify his ways on occasions like the one which has sorely stricken us in an overwhelming manner and scale.

If we associate the ethical principles with cosmic phenomena we shall have to admit that human nature is morally superior to Providence that preaches lessons in good behaviour in orgies of the worst behaviour possible. For we can never imagine any civilised ruler of men making indiscriminate examples of casual victims including children and members of the untouchable community in order to impress others dwelling at a safe distance who possibly deserve severer condemnation. Though we cannot point out any period of human history that is free from iniquities of the darkest kind, we still find citadels of malevolence yet remain unshaken, that factories that cruelly thrive upon the abject poverty and ignorance of famished cultivators, or prison houses in all parts of the world where the penal system is pursued, which most often is a special form of licensed criminality, still stand firm. It only shows the law of gravitation does not in the least respond to the stupendous load of callousness that accumulates till the moral foundation of our society begins to show dangerous cracks and civilisations are undermined.

What is truly tragic about it is the fact that the kind of argument that Mahatmaji used by exploiting an event of cosmic disturbance, far better suits the psychology of his opponents than his own and it would not have surprised me at all if they had taken this opportunity of holding himself and his followers responsible for the visitation of divine anger. As for us we feel perfectly secure in the faith that our own sins and errors, however enormous, have not got enough force to drag down the structure of creation to ruins.

We can depend upon it, sinners and saints, bigots and breakers of conventions. We, who are immensely grateful to Mahatmaji for inducing by his wonderful inspiration, freedom from fear and feebleness in the minds of his countrymen, feel profoundly hurt when any words from his mouth may emphasise elements of unreason in those very minds, unreason which is the fundamental source of all blind powers that drive us against freedom and self-respect.

MEN AND ANIMALS.*

(By J. H. HARWOOD.)

A recent article in the Indian Witness taken from the Indian Social Reformer informs us that in the eyes of the editor of the latter periodical the cows of America lack the almost human graces of their Indian bovine sisters. One can imagine his feeling as he was given a haughty stare by some well-fed and flourishing Holstein or Jersey under whose smooth coat lay those "unwieldy" masses of flesh covering the bones which are so painfully obvious among India's emaciated herds. It all sounds fine to think of the social union which makes a cow consciously a member of the family in an Indian village home—fine, perhaps, for the cow! but not so elevating when one thinks of the status of humanity which accepts such membership in the family circle.

Isn't there a peculiar kind of anthropomorphism in popular Oriental ideas about the sacredness of animal life? It is either anthropomorphism or a survival of animism, probably the latter. After all there is a distinction between animal life and humanity, and there need be no foggy misunderstanding.

Some of us are apt to view the animal kingdom too sentimentally and ascribe to the lower orders the feelings we would have if we were in their circumstances. This is the Western more than the Oriental tendency. We are apt to make too much of the perpetual struggle for survival, forgetting that as far as evidence is available birds and animals live joyously on the whole, even pursuing or pursued as the case may be, but with no nervous fear of consequence or haunting memory of dangers past. As a lad at home I remember how a shaggy old shepherd dog on our farm loved to chase rabbits. He was always so sure he would win some day. The rabbits appeared to have an equally good time out of their share in the race. None of them became nervous wrecks in the process. A human being, such bundles of nerves as we are, under the rabbits' circumstances would nearly collapse with panic and live the scene over and over in our imaginations after it was over. The pursued animal just puts all he has into the God-given instinct to survive; and no fluttering nerves disturb the smooth functioning of its body as it speeds on its way. If it is caught, that's just too bad; but it's all over in a jiffy and no regrets.

Most of us are apt to feel that the Oriental view of animal life is not one of too much sentimental pity but a view shaded deeply by the transmigrationist superstition. A Burmese taxi driver slaps on his brakes and skids his car to avoid running down a mangy pariah dog, not because he pities the dog but because of an unreasoning taboo on the taking of life. This superstition is so strong that millions of our Asiatic friends would not lift a finger to bring the relief of death to a miserable and disease-tortured quadruped; they would not even destroy the verminous animal life which imperils humanity. A few years ago at a physical training camp an American Y. M. C. A. Secretary was trying to introduce this subject of comparative values to a group of Buddhist vernacular teachers. He hesitated to speak plainly lest he should offend the religious feelings of his class. One of the Burman instructors in the camp, an emancipated Buddhist with modern training and outlook, took the situation plainly in hand and told the class plainly that if they tolerated rats and ownerless dogs around their communities it just meant that they loved animals more than their human neighbours and that was all there was to it; it could not be "both and" but "either or."

* From the Indian Witness.

There appears to be no historical ground for any supposition that scrupulous regard for the sacredness of animal life implies a high standard of personal values in human relationships. India's excessive zeal for cow protection was not accompanied by any largehearted application of the ideals of human brotherhood. In fact so-called "cow protection" has not even proved good for cattle. If the animal's measure of joy in life consists in the enjoyment of creature comforts while life lasts rather than length of days under conditions of neglect and starvation, the cattle of the Western world certainly enjoy a fulness of life which is denied those of India.

The fact is that the rights of men and the rights of animals are on an entirely different plane; and it is morally detrimental to mix the two. This applies to people of all nations. Many of us know of American and English people who are capable of carrying a whole hearted affection for a pet dog into an excess of sentiment that is not good for the dog and which blinds the doglover to the claims of near-by and needy human neighbours.

There is no great exposition of this animal question in the Gospels because there was not any excessive stress on the subject in the world of the days of Jesus; but the Son of Man certainly put the issue fairly and reasonably once when he asked, "How much is a man worth more than a sheep?" It was a rhetorical question requiring no answer because the contrast of values was plainly implied in the putting of the question. The needs of sheep and of all animals are simple and may be satisfied quite readily; but the needs and aspirations of humanity are infinitely deeper and broader.

MAN'S PLACE IN THE COSMIC SYSTEM.

Mr. K. Natarajan writes:—

Mr. Harwood seems to be hurt by my casual observation that American cows are not so gentle as Indian cows. I am sorry. But when he compares the fatness of the former with the leanness of the latter, he might remind himself of the well-fed condition of the American farmer with the semi-starvation of the Indian peasant. Then, again, the American tends the cow not only for her milk but also for her flesh. When the Indians adopted Ahimsa as their guiding principle, and abjured flesh food, the preservation of the milch cows became a national concern and was eventually transformed into a racial instinct. The same was the case but in an opposite direction with intoxicating drinks. Mr. Harwood proceeds on the basis of my casual remark to contrast the Christian with the Hindu and Buddhist view of the place of man in the cosmic system. This is a very large theme to be dealt with in this short note. I may, however, say that my study of Christ's teachings leads me to think that his view was more akin to the Hindu than to the Western Christian view. The examples of the lily and the sparrow are unhesitatingly used as exemplars for human conduct.

The Saree:—Mr. A. H. Mackenzie, Director of Public Instruction, at Lucknow, writes: "I have noticed something curious about the sarees of Indian ladies. They are worn differently in different parts of the country. Some ladies put them over their heads, some don't. Some put them over one shoulder, some over another and some over both. Some wind them one way, some another. In colour they are more varied than the hues of the rainbow or the flowers of the field. But all Indian ladies who wear the saree have one characteristic in common. They wear the saree gracefully. The saree seems to me to express something characteristic of Indian womanhood whether worn by the coolie in the field or by the Rani in her palace—grace and gentleness."

INDIAN STATES PEOPLES' CONFERENCE

(Hindustan Times.)

The special session of the States Peoples' Conference was held under the presidentship of Mr. K. Natarajan, Editor of the "Indian Social Reformer" in a tastefully decorated pandal behind the Imperial Bank of India, Delhi.

About 500 delegates from different States in the Punjab, Central India, Kathiawar, Gujarat, and the Deccan were present, besides a large number of distinguished citizens, members of the Bar, business men, States subjects and other visitors.

Mr. K. Natarajan, on his arrival in the pandal, was accorded a very hearty reception. The addresses of the Chairman and the President were read and the session adjourned to the next day.

Prominent amongst those present at the Conference were B. S. Pathik, B. Narsingh Das, Mr. Deshpande, Mr. Shankar Lal Varma and Mr. Prayag Raj Bhandari from Patiala State. The following prominent persons came from Punjab, Sardar Radha Singh, Giani Kehar Singh, Mr. Talib Hussain of Maler Kotla, S. Madan Singh of Sangrur, S. Kartar Singh, Mr. Sant Ram of Nabha, and Mr. Labhu Ram of Kapurthala. Several others from different parts of India including Mr. Akbar Shah Khan of Afghanpur (U. P.), Pandit Sri Krishan of Dholpur, Mr. Tansukh Rai of Kotah and Mr. Apte of Ratlam. Among the local prominent persons were Mr. S. C. Mitra, M. L. A., Mr. Jog, M. L. A., Mr. B. Das, M. L. A., Mr. Amarnath Datta, M. L. A., and Messrs. L. N. Gadodia, B. Banerjee, Tawaqli, Raghuraj Singh and Diwan Singh Maftoon.

The pandal was packed on Sunday with delegates and distinguished visitors.

The proceedings commenced with national flag songs, recited by Seva Sadan girl students. Messages of sympathy from Sjt. Abbas Tyabji, Mr. Satyamurti and several organisations were then read.

The first two resolutions were moved by the Chair.

"This Conference is deeply grieved at the terrible calamity which has befallen the people of Bihar and Nepal by the earthquake, assures them of its heartfelt sympathy in their sufferings and appeals to the Princes and the people of the States to render assistance to the best of their capacity in men and money to the distressed people."

The President in moving the resolution said that the calamity that had befallen Bihar and Nepal was an unparalleled one in the last hundred years and even foreign countries were moved by the sufferings of the victims of earthquake. He appealed to the princes to contribute liberally towards the relief fund.

"This Conference records its sense of the great and irreparable loss the country has suffered by the death of Mr. V. J. Patel, one of our greatest nationalists and patriots and an inveterate fighter for the country's freedom who laid down his life in the service of the Motherland, and sends its condolence to the bereaved family."

The President in moving the resolution said that the late Mr. Patel was his neighbour and friend. He had devoted his whole life to his country and even on his death bed, he was continuously deliberating on the situation in India. The death of such a learned, wise and influential politician at this juncture, was a great and irreparable loss.

The following resolution relating to the Princes Protection Bill was next moved by Mr. P. L. Chudgar:

1. "This Conference is of the opinion that the Indian States (Protection) Bill now before the Legislative Assembly,

- (a) is absolutely unnecessary and uncalled for.
- (b) is further an unwarranted encroachment on the liberty of the press.
- (c) is calculated to perpetuate autocracy and misrule in the Indian States.
- (d) deprives the people of the States of their only available remedy to ventilate their grievances.
- (e) is calculated to defeat its own purpose.
- (f) is contrary to the spirit of federation, and the Conference fears that the Bill may drive disaffection under ground and tend to secret sedition.

2. In particular this Conference strongly protests against Sections 4 and 6 which should be omitted and also against the inclusion of the following words in Section 5, which too should be dropped.

- 1. Interference with the administration of the said state
- 2. or a disturbance of public tranquility
- 3. or any affray."

Mr. Chudgar in moving the resolution made a most forceful and able speech. He said it could not be denied that in almost all the native states except a very few, the ruler was the supreme authority and 80 millions of people were at the mercy of these autocrats.

Mr. B. S. Pathik (Rajputana), Mr. Talib Hussain (Maler Kotla), Mr. G. Pathak (Nabha), Mr. Anant Rao and Shrimati Chando Bibi also spoke.

Mr. Manishankar Trivedi (Western India States) next moved the following resolution:

"1. This Conference very greatly appreciates the sympathy of these members of the Assembly who have advocated and are advocating the States peoples' cause and offer them their hearty and grateful thanks.

2. This Conference appeals to all the non-official members of the Assembly to put up a stout opposition to the Princes' Protection Bill and to throw it out; or at least do their best to secure the modifications set forth in the Resolution No. 8."

The mover made a moving speech on the condition of people in some States in the Punjab and told the members of the assembly to watch the interests of millions of voiceless people.

Mr. Narain Vyas and Mr. Sant Ram (Nabha) also spoke on the resolution.

The next resolution ran as follows:—

"This Conference is indebted to the press, for their great support and sympathy for our fight against the Bill, thanks the volunteers for their great labours, thanks Seth Jogdhyani for kindly giving the site for the Conference pandal free of cost, and Sheth Anand Raji Surana for placing at our disposal his office, his staff, and his resources for the use of the Conference."

Baba Narsinghdas and Mr. Raoji Bhai Patel who moved and seconded the resolution paid special compliments to the press in Delhi for assisting the authorities of the Conference.

Mr. P. L. Chudgar moved a vote of thanks to the Chair.

PRESIDENT'S ADVICE.

Mr. Natarajan in the course of his concluding speech said he was not a politician but a social reformer. But there were no two methods for social reformers and politics. "If you persevere with moderation and sincerity you will achieve your aims," said he. He said the Princes were our own flesh and blood and it was no use abusing them since we were also responsible for their deplorable condition. Replying to Shrimati Chando Bibi's allegation that he being a moderate had said nothing about the deplorable condition of women in the native states, he said no constitution could prevent atrocities against women. He said that the All-India Women's Conference, which was affiliated with the International Women's Conference, should take up the question of ill-treatment of women in the Indian States and if they take up the question seriously he was sure the troubles of women would disappear.

Continuing, he suggested that since the Indian Princes were always proud of their loyalty to His Majesty the King-Emperor, let the States subjects approach the King-Emperor to appoint a commission of enquiry to enquire into the conditions of 80 million people living in States and he hoped the princes too will have no objection to such a Commission.

He also advised the formation of a Standing Committee to prepare a list of grievances of the people of native States and present them before the Home Member.

He was sorry that the Princes Chamber session was postponed this season, but he advised the princes to come out in the open and lay their case before the people. Concluding he made an appeal for the continuity of the order of princes, since he said it was an ancient historic continuity and an institution peculiar to India. He said: "Let us sympathise with the princes, let us pity them, control your words, act righteously and you will win in the long run."

The Conference came to an end after a song.

HINDU TRAITS IN ARABIA.

Striking observations on the inhabitants of the hinterland of the south-eastern coasts of Arabia were made by Mr. Bertram Thomas, the explorer, at a lecture under the auspices of the London County Council at Birkbeck College (Chancery Lane).

He found that in that outskirts of the "Empty Quarter" as the Rubial Khali is called, inhabitants and fauna had traits which associated them with Ethiopia rather than with northern Arabia, while certain customs approximated more with Hindu culture than with that of their near Muslim neighbours.

The men of this strip of densely wooded hills had fuzzy hair, Mr. Thomas said, if not negritic distinctly negroid as in Ethiopia, while the callipers showed him to be round headed like the South African negro, and not long-headed like the "Armenoid" Arab.

The tonsure of the male, was often shaved into one thick central lock falling on the nape of the neck, as worn in a certain Hindu caste.

While these aborigines, as he believed them to be, would swear faith by God and break it without a qualm—a thing abhorrent to the Muslims on the other side of the "Empty Quarter"—if they swore faith by one of the ruined shrines dotted about the country, they would be most careful to keep their word.

So while in some respects like Ethiopians, with traits in common with South African negroes and customs resembling those of certain Hindu sects the people discovered by Mr. Thomas was definitely non-Arab.

The lecture was illustrated with slides, first showing the abortive attempts to cross the Rubial Khali which covered 250 miles and lasted two months and failed, because the camels were not acclimatised to the zone.

The second attempt, in which Mr. Thomas was aided by Sheikh Sari, and which succeeded, was finely illustrated all the way from the Hadhrant to Bedah, and with a thrill of admiration one heard from Mr. Thomas that his Bedouin guides could tell the footprint of any man, woman, child or camel in their tribe and conversely could tell if any footprint was that of an enemy tribe.

INDIAN ARTS EXHIBITION.

It is understood that attempts are being made in Calcutta to form a Regional Committee in Calcutta, to collaborate with the Council of the India Society, London, of which Marquess of Zetland is the President, towards the holding of a representative exhibition of the Fine Arts of Modern India. The Calcutta committee would collect and despatch exhibits from the province.

It is held that the exhibition which will be held at the New Burlington Galleries in September and October, 1934, will be as great a success as the Persian Art Exhibition at the same place about three years ago.

The aim of the exhibition will be to show to the public in England and funds permitting by repeating it on the continent of Europe, a selection of the best work done by Indian artists in modern times in painting and drawing, sculpture and architecture. It is the desire of the Council that it would be convenient so far as painting and sculpture are concerned, to exclude work prior to the twentieth century; in regard to architecture, the latter part of the nineteenth century should be included. All work submitted must be original work by Indian artists.

The Council is composed among others of Dr. A. K. Coomaraswamy, Mrs. Rhys Davids, The Director of the Ecole Francaise D'Extreme Orient, the High-Commissioner for India, the French Ambassador, the Japanese Ambassador, Lord Irwin, the Persian Minister, Sir Denison Ross in London and of Dr. Rabindra Nath Tagore and Dr. Abanindra Nath Tagore in India; the Chairman of the Council is Lt-Col. Sir Francis Younghusband and the Secretary, Mr. F. J. P. Richter.

NEW LEPROSY CURE.

The Hindu correspondent at Ramnad writes:—

According to the instructions by the Surgeon-General, Madras, to demonstrate his new leprosy cure, under the presidency of Dr. Narayanaswami Aiyar, District Medical Officer, Ramnad, Dr. P. S. N. Moorthi Naidu, President of the Indo-British Welfare League and discoverer of a new leprosy cure, started a demonstration on some select cases of leprosy at the Leper Asylum, Dayyapuram, in Manamadura, Ramnad District.

There was a very large gathering of eminent doctors from various parts of the Presidency, besides several prominent gentlemen on the occasion eagerly watching the mode and the methods of the cure by Dr. Moorthi.

The District Medical Officer, Ramnad, introduced Dr. Naidu to the public of Manamadura and said that he has found out a medicine to kill the dire disease—leprosy, that he would give his demonstrations in the leper asylum for two months. He made an appeal to the public and all those present on the occasion to co-operate with him and wished the doctor all success in his attempts.

He was followed by Dr. Wolsted, Superintendent of Leper Asylum, Manamadura who in his address surveyed the activities of the Asylum in curing leper patients since its establishment, and said that people were sent out every year, only with the certificates, that the patients had no symptoms of the disease. He could not say that they were completely cured. He felt glad however to see Dr. Naidu coming forward to eradicate completely the disease. He stated that the Americans did not generally believe that leper patients would be completely cured. But now, as it was claimed that cure was going to be complete, he was prepared to give all convenience to the doctor in his Asylum and wished him all success in his attempts.

Dr. Viswanatha Aiyar, thanked the doctor on behalf of the public of Manamadura.

Dr. Moorthi Naidu in thanking them all for their welcome, requested the public to co-operate with him in his attempt and watch the methods to eradicate leprosy in two months' duration.

After the function was over, the D. M. O., Ramnad, Rev. Wolsted, Dr. Moorthi Naidu, Dr. R. P. Haran and others motored to the Leper Asylum, where ten acute cases were selected from the patients in the Asylum and demonstrations were made. The remedy which has been discovered by the doctor was administered both internally and externally. Dr. Naidu is staying at Manamadura in connection with the demonstration and facilities have been provided for him by the authorities of the Leper Asylum at the Dayyapuram Hospital. The results would be announced after some time.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

How Indian Women View Communalism.—"Modern Materialism was endangering the very foundations of religion. The over-emphasised individual was striking at the root of society. The spirit of self-aggrandisement could be seen in communal strifes and strifes among the nations. Indian women were free from the taint of religious bigotry. They could best banish communalism from Indian public life." The above observation was made by Lady Wazir Hassan, wife of the Chief Judge, Oudh Chief Court, Lucknow, in her address to the Lucknow Women's Association. She continued:

"What was the need of fettering an intellectual being like man with religious restrictions when he could discriminate between good and evil. The popular belief was that religion aimed at engaging human beings in the worship of God. While this was true to a large extent, the real aim behind religious observances and ceremonial went much beyond the question of mere betterment of the individual.

"To every religious institution could be traced the idea of some social virtue like devotion or 'tapasja' and charity or alms.

"All religious institutions were social in their nature, they aimed at bringing together human beings to enable them to partake of each others thoughts and feelings.

"Such communion created a bond of sympathy and understanding among fellowmen and women, a trait that distinguished human beings from the lower forms of life."

Lady Wazir Hassan finally made an appeal for a better understanding of the spirit of religion as distinguished from bigotry and hoped that the Association would do its best to banish communalism from Indian public life.

Ramkrishna Mission Project.—Ramkrishna Mission, Cawnpore, is starting a Harijan Mahavidyalaya with the object of training Harijans in carpentry, weaving, tailoring, leather work, soap making and other cottage industries with a view to enable every Harijan to earn at least a living wage and thereby raise their standard of living, to enable them to give later in life proper education to their children. Ramkrishna Mission proposes to start workshops on their premises where Harijans may not only learn work but also learn to manage affairs for themselves according to their capabilities and enterprise and to push intelligence, energy, enthusiasm and willingness to share responsibility. The Ramkrishna Mission has the support of almost all leading workers, publicmen and lady workers and it is hoped therefore that the mission will be able to achieve great success in her praiseworthy and laudable work.

Prayaschit and Social Reform:—Prayaschit is a Sanskrit word which has through long usage come to mean 'penitential act'. The literal meaning of the term is 'after thought'. As repentance comes after sin and not before, it is associated with afterthought and also identified with it. Prayaschit is prescribed for the several sins recognised by the Hindu Code and varies from pouring molten lead down the throat for addiction to drink, to a bath and change of clothes for pollution caused by contact with forbidden persons or objects. There are between these two extremes numerous major and minor penalties. They generally consist of a religious ceremony and an offering as an act of sacrifice. In course of time, the ceremony became a mere formality but the offering became the principal item of the prayaschit. The expenses connected with some prayaschits were heavy, and Ranade, when he persuaded the Shankaracharya to reduce the cost of expiating for an alleged offence of drinking tea at the house of a Christian Missionary to the nominal sum of annas four (which by a curious coincidence is also the price of the Congress franchise), half-humourously claimed that he had made smooth the way of intercommensality by making it cheap. The Social Reform Party, as a whole, however, stood out against prayaschit as opposed to the very basis of reform, namely, that it is the right way of life and that a man can not repent for what he did because he thought it the right thing to do. Neither orthodox Hinduism nor social reformers ever thought of, prayaschita except as an individual penance for an individual's sins of omission and commission. The idea of sin and repentance by a whole people is familiar to readers of the Old Testament and even Jesus occasionally spoke as if it was not incongruous with His central doctrine of the supremacy of Omnipresent, Omniscient Love. But it is not only unknown but wholly repugnant to Hinduism. When Mahatma Gandhi calls untouchability a national sin, it is only those Hindus who have read the Hebrew scripture who grasp his meaning. You can not indict a whole nation, said Edmund Burke. It is sound political philosophy. It is also sound theology. So much as regards the theory. The Prayaschit doctrine in social reform has also a practical disadvantage. When a man pays a rupee to his priest by way of prayaschit for the sin, say, of dining on ekadasi day—which most people do nowadays without any thought of atonement—he believes that the sin has been wiped off and will not count against him after the payment is made. Many of those who have made contributions to the Harijan fund as a prayaschit, seem to be of the same view. They have paid their fine and done their duty.

The Aga Khan on Communal Electorates:—The Aga Khan in an interview reported by the Associated Press pleaded for the acceptance for the time being of communal electorates as a necessary evil, but added that they were utterly incompatible with democratic notions and were bound to die a natural death in a short time as it will surely be realised that they do not serve the purpose of protecting minorities which they are supposed to serve. His Highness used much stronger language but this is the substance of his observations. This has been our own view and we are glad that the Aga Khan has come round to it. We say 'come round' because it was a deputation headed by him which secured from the late Lord Minto the fateful declaration in favour of communal electorates. The Aga Khan's observations, therefore mark a turning point in Indian constitutional reform. According to an unconfirmed report by the United Press agency, Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru has sent word to the Aga Khan suggesting that Hindus would be prepared to concede to Muslims all the demands regarding safeguards to them in the provinces where they are in a minority, and that they on their part should agree to join the electorates without any reservation of seats in provinces where they are the majority. If this suggestion is agreed to, the main obstacle in the way of a settlement in the Punjab and Bengal will disappear and His Highness will have rendered an important service to the country.

A Government House Innovation :—We reprint from the Times of India an excellent summary of an address on Indian music delivered at Government House Bombay on the place of India in Musicology by the Dutch savant, Professor A. A. Bake. It is a most thoughtful and suggestive address and will be read with interest by all who welcome an appreciative cultural understanding between East and West as the best means of promoting international friendship. Lord and Lady Brabourne are to be congratulated on this departure from the long established routine of Government House. If Government Houses in this country become cultural centres instead of confining themselves to social functions of a narrowly exclusive character, they will ensure more intellectual co-operation between the official and non-official worlds which at present move largely each in its own orbit.

Failure of Co-operation:—The central idea running through the carefully thought-out address which Mr. Vaikunt L. Mehta delivered as President of the United Provinces Co-operative Conferences last week, is that co-operation to strike root in Indian soil must establish enduring contacts with other phases of national life. This is a truth inattention to which is responsible for the sterility of many measures started with the best of intentions but without reference to the main currents of thought and life in this country. Bureaucracy can work out measures. It can not put life into them. The Co-operative Movement became some years ago a fashion in India just like rural reconstruction at the present day. The defects and drawbacks of a statutory, spoon-fed system were kept in the background as long as possible. But the economic depression has exposed its weaknesses. It is to the credit of Mr. Vaikunt Mehta that he has the candour to confess that a great change has come over his hopes of Co-operation. Without the fertilising manure of literacy the message of co-operation has fallen largely on barren soil. The gospel of non-co-operation thrives best on illiteracy because it merely asks that nothing should be done or attempted. By the way, we are surprised to see some journals which ought to know better, still recommending Mr. Brayne's much-belauded scheme as a model. We have heard that the whole structure collapsed when its sponsor left the district.

Women in Politics:—Many people who strongly supported the extension of the suffrage to women, did so on the ground that the coming of women into politics would humanise politics. It is too early to judge but we are sorry to say that the course of events so far has not altogether been such as to give support to this belief. The repeal of the Prohibition law in the United States was made possible by the defection of women voters at the polls. Of much less importance but not without significance is the pertinacity of the Duchess of Atholl in the British House of Commons in urging the Secretary of State for India to stiffen the already unprecedented repressive laws and orders, some of which we published in previous issues, now in force in the two districts of Bengal where there have been murders of officials by revolutionary anarchists. Sir Samuel Hoare pleaded that he has given all the powers which the officials wanted but the lady is not satisfied. The best thing under the circumstances is to send her out as Special Commissioner to take charge of the disturbed districts with plenary powers to deal as she likes with the unfortunate inhabitants.

India and the British :—That British writers are at last realising that Indian history is something more than the history of the British connection with India is strangely shown by Graham Seton Hutchinson in his latest book, "Arya or the Call of the Future" published by Hutchinson. Mr. Hutchinson is well-known as an author of detective stories and his intrusion into more serious spheres is likely to be resented by those who consider themselves final authorities on the subject. Mr. Hutchinson, however, has to be congratulated on having stated with force what Indian leaders have been urging for some time past. "In order to understand," he writes, "the difficulty of the Indian problem, it should be realised that every expert with scarcely an exception, certainly nearly every one who occupies a place in the British public eye, accepts as the foundation of his views the superficial Anglo-India, with which for twenty or forty years he had rubbed shoulders. The standard histories of India which provide the text works for British statesmen and for generation after generation of administrators, demonstrate a total misunderstanding of the Indian mind as expressed in the great monuments of Indian art."

Soya Beans :—His Highness the Maharaja Gaekwar, as one result of his recent visit to Japan, has become interested in the introduction of the soya bean as a nutritious and easily cultivable crop in this country. The Maharaja has had the seed sown in the Government farm at Baroda. As a means of popularising the use of this lentil, a Baroda officer, Mr. Kale, has been put in charge of a stall in the Japanese village in the "Help Our Hospitals" Exhibition now open in Bombay. In this a large variety of preparations made of the bean is available for inspection and tasting by visitors. Practically everything on an Indian menu can be made of the bean—chutnies, papads, sweets, and even tea and coffee. The superiority of this lentil over others lies in its greater proportion of protein. The experiment in Baroda to grow it, will be watched with interest. We do not suppose that it will be a substitute for rice or wheat. Even in China and Japan where the soya bean is well-known, it has not displaced rice as the principal article of diet. But it will add variety to the dietary of rich and poor alike and that is a great advantage.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1934.

THE FILM OF KARMA.

"Karma," the first Indian talkie with English dialogue, has several points to commend it. In the first place, it is one of the few stories shown on the screen in which Indian characters are shown neither as villains nor as comic personalities. Then, again, it is the first picture with a mainly Indian cast in English. One welcomes with relief the absence of incongruity which Western producers of Oriental pictures are only too frequently led into. Mr. Himansu Rai, the producer of the picture, and Devika Rani, who is starred in the film, are fortunate in the official and unofficial welcome which their production has received and on that they are to be congratulated. The film is also valuable as it sets in relief certain requirements which will have to be met before a perfect Indian film with dialogue in English is produced.

The story of Karma is a thin one, and the dialogue, mainly in classical, not to say archaic, English, is throughout feeble, verging at times dangerously on the fatuous. The scenic effect is nothing exceptional. Only from the point of photography does the picture surpass the good type of Indian production. One has a feeling of incongruity in listening to beggars, snake-charmers and beaters at a tiger hunt, talk in Shakesperian English. By the way, the large majority of English-speaking people do not find it necessary to speak it as it is spoken in its homeland, and it is not clear why in India where it has been established as a vernacular, men and women should not speak it naturally. The music is evidently a combination, and a rather mechanical one at that, of Western and Eastern. We are not sure that the manner of showing emotions, and even some of the emotional reactions, are native to India.

It is not difficult to understand the wild enthusiasm with which, in spite of these, to the Indian so obvious, defects, the English press welcomed the production. In the first place, British critics are apt to forget that English-speaking Indians, however small a minority they might be, have had nearly six generations of training in the art behind them. They are also increasingly recognising that the pronunciation of the language cannot be standardised even as between individuals. In the second place, India still holds for the Westerners the glamour which drew the first adventurers out East. There is in the story an Indian Prince, a tiger with a couple of elephants thrown in and a snake-charmer, a palace, a holy man, an old orthodox Maharaja who at the appropriate place taps himself on the forehead and whispers, without any relevance except that of justifying the title of the film, the word "Karma"—sufficient ingredients to bring the 'thrill of the Orient' to Western audiences; whilst, at the same time, the love scenes in the picture, a happy ending, A couple of songs and a dance serve to preserve enough kinship with the productions of Hollywood and Elstree to make it intelligible to an European audience.

The film was released to the public in Bombay on Saturday the 10th. The trailer which was shown a week earlier with a view to introducing it to the public, announced, regardless of the Indian audience to which it was to appeal, that it would bring home to them the glamour of India and the thrills of another world—an introduction which might appropriately have preceded the release of an American or European film in India. One might have expected that the Indian press would have been more critical of the film than the British had been. Yet it was surprising to find the same sentiments echoed with varying fervour both in Bombay as well as at Delhi where it was shown a week earlier.

PANDIT JAWHARLAL'S ARREST.

Several days before the earthquake, Pandit Jawharlal Nehru delivered some lectures and speeches which, it was stated in a newspaper, might lead to action being taken against him by the Government of the United Provinces. To the great relief of everybody, in particular of those who dissented from and criticised the Pandit's theories, there was a prompt official contradiction of this suggestion. Then, the earthquake came and the Pandit for many days past has been actively interesting himself in the problem of relief in the districts devastated by it. The news that he was arrested was published on the same day and almost side by side with the announcement that the Government of India had extended the concession of remitting contributions by money order without the usual commission to the Relief Fund controlled by Babu Rajendra Prasad, the much respected Bihar Congress leader who came out of prison just a few days before the earthquake, as it was being administered in close cooperation with the Government of Bihar and Orissa. Pandit Jawharlal went to Bihar at Babu Rajendra Prasad's urgent request and he had thrown himself into the relief work with characteristic zeal. We are yet hoping that the co-operation induced by the great calamity may lead to co-operation in other directions, and that this may turn out to be the soul of good in the earthquake disaster. The Pandit's arrest is something of a setback to this hope. We trust it will not prove to be a serious handicap to Babu Rajendra Babu and to the relief operations. We are unable to reconcile the arrest of the Pandit at this juncture with the recent trend of the Government of India's policy. It was reported the next day that the warrant for the arrest of the Pandit was issued on the complaint of the Government of Bengal regarding a speech or speeches made in Calcutta.

LIMITATIONS OF THE CO-OPERATIVE MOVEMENT.*

(By VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA)

I look upon myself as too much a part of the internal machinery of the co-operative movement in a sister province of yours to be in a position to give any useful lead or offer any helpful advice in these troubled times when we find the co-operative systems everywhere in India being nearly overwhelmed by the unprecedented economic depression through which they were passing until about four years ago. I must honestly admit, my faith in and zeal for co-operation were so unbounded that I could scarcely conceive of any rural economic problem that would not be amenable to treatment on co-operative lines. Even though my faith may be undimmed to-day and my zeal as ardent as before, I have a growing feeling that there are economic forces which are wholly beyond the power of co-operation to control, and that there has to be a veritable revolution in our agrarian and economic system—and in our outlook on life—before we can really bring happiness and prosperity to the agriculturists whom we have attracted to the banner of co-operation by the promise of relief from usury and of better farming and better business.

To bring about this transformation, the first desideratum is the diffusion of education and the immediate liquidation of illiteracy. It is now over twenty-five years since the late Mr. Gopal Krishna Gokhale, with the far-seeing vision of a statesman, called upon the reformed Government under the Morley-Minto regime to inaugurate a new era in this country by introducing throughout India a scheme of free and compulsory education. His pleadings, however, fell on deaf ears with the result that we find to-day the doors of knowledge closed to no less than 92 per cent. of our population. My most vivid recollection of the first provincial co-operative conference that I attended in my province in 1913 is the vigorous advocacy by Sir Vithaldas D. Thackersey, the joint founder of the institution with which I am connected, of compulsory education at least for the children of the members of co-operative societies. The officials and their satellites scoffed at and turned down his proposal which, however, if adopted would have yielded us, by now, a new generation of rural co-operators, teachable and receptive to new ideas, as happened in Denmark through the development of its system of folk high schools. The same veteran co-operator endowed a scheme of night schools for adults, full fifteen years before the Government of Bombay began thinking in terms of rural uplift, but we had unfortunately to witness his experiment abandoned for lack of resources after his demise in 1922. These were true statesmen and true co-operators who insisted that education was the foundation of all progress. To apply the words of Lenin to our conditions, as long as we have such a calamity as illiteracy in our country, it is impossible to talk of economic progress. The illiterate person is an outsider to all progressive thought, for without literacy there can be no progress—there are only rumours, gossip, prejudices, fairy tales—anything but conscious organized effort to achieve common economic ends. Let us hope that in view of the newly awakened interest of various governments in India in schemes of rural welfare, there will be inaugurated—if necessary with the aid of large subventions from the Central Government—a vigorous campaign for the liquidation of illiteracy in all parts of the country. It should be the duty of co-operators never to cease insisting on the introduction of free and compulsory education and at the same time according to the education both of children—boys and girls—and of adults—men and women—the foremost place in their programmes of better living and rural reconstruction. We want a redirection of our system of education, so that every individual becomes well-equipped both as a citizen in a new society and as a helpful unit in the economic life of the nation.

A problem of equal importance that has hitherto defied solution is the abolition of usury and the relief of the peasant from the burden of debt. The co-operative movement—originally confined to credit—was introduced as a method of dealing with the evil of usury which, it was argued, led to the accumulation of debt; but within less than two decades from the introduction of the movement, we come to realize—at least in Madras, Bombay and the Punjab—that the problem of indebtedness was not capable of solution through our ordinary system of co-operative credit.

The income of the cultivators in India has been reduced by nearly a half in 1931-32 as compared with 1928-29. It may be that the United Provinces, according to statisticians, may not have suffered as grievously as other provinces, the decline being 38 per cent. as against 54 in Bengal and 48 in the Bombay; but compared to Bombay, Madras and the Punjab the cultivator in the United Provinces has much less resisting power as he has no resources on which to fall back in times of distress. The proceeds which the agriculturist obtains from his produce are reduced by half by the fall in prices and as it is from such reduced proceeds that he has to meet his cash payment which are more or less fixed, such as revenue interest and instalment on debts, the difficulties of his situation may well be imagined.

In any system of ordered rural economy, such as the co-operative movement seeks to bring about, a very prominent place is occupied by organized marketing. The illiteracy and backwardness of our rural population are undoubtedly a handicap; but, this notwithstanding, it is time that we set about developing some machinery for the co-operative sale of agricultural produce on lines that have commended themselves to the Agricultural Commission and the Banking Committees. I refer particularly to the latter's recommendation for the grant of liberal subsidies to co-operative agencies for the construction of godowns and the provision of finance at concessional rates for the development of co-operative sale societies. In Bombay, we have achieved a fair measure of success in the organization of arrangements for the joint sale of cotton and gul—the former under the guidance, in the early stages, of the officers of Government, and the latter of the Provincial Bank. But our experience is that for the development of these arrangements, their extension throughout the Presidency and the handling of the fruit trade it is essential that the State should interest itself more actively in these efforts than it has done so far. In this connection, I would like to point out that in India, owing to the peculiar structure of our rural credit organization, it will be wise for co-operative credit to be linked organically with the functions of purchase and sale; and I agree with your Provincial Banking Committee that the partial failure of our efforts so far is due to the divorce of credit from supply and marketing. Hence the organization of supply and marketing acquires an additional significance in our country because of the strength and stability it imparts to our mechanism of rural credit, in as much as the linking up of credit with supply and marketing will enable us to ensure the proper use of loans and to secure genuine recoveries through the produce that is sold.

The fourth factor of economic life that affects rural progress in general is the removal of the pressure of population on the land by the revival, introduction and development of art-crafts, small industries and subsidiary occupations. As the Provincial Committee observe in their Report, a system of farming combined with industry, which gives regular employment throughout the year, enables some agricultural countries of Europe to maintain a density of 200 to 800 persons to the square mile.

Coming as I do from a province the special feature of whose co-operative development is the vitality, if not the strength, of its banking organization, I am inclined to agree with the Provincial Banking Committee that the co-operative credit structure in the United Provinces remains incomplete in the absence of a provincial co-operative bank at the apex. You have, no doubt, in your midst a large number of strong well developed central banks and banking unions, which may be serving very satisfactorily the requirements of the primary societies that are affiliated to them. But these isolated units must come together for common economic ends, such as the investment of their surplus funds and the securing of external financial assistance on the most favourable terms.

Co-operators can do much, in the meanwhile, to educate public opinion, especially in rural areas, to secure action on the part of the State for the introduction of free and compulsory education, the raising of agricultural prices, the inauguration of a rural credit policy—including the enactment of agrarian legislation and the provision of cheap long term credit—the promotion of works of land improvement and the development of subsidiary rural industries. Such a programme alone can, in my opinion, constitute the proper background for the campaign of rural reconstruction through co-operative agency that you have been vigorously pursuing during the last few years. Valuable as social work is, it can never be a substitute for the strength that is acquired through economic betterment and education, which should, therefore, be in the forefront of any programme of reconstruction.

It is my very firm belief that co-operation will succeed only in so far as it carries public opinion with it, but that it will positively fail the moment it is looked upon as an integral part of the machinery of Government. In an outspoken memorandum addressed to the Royal Commission on Agriculture, the late Sir Horace Plunkett bewailed this tendency, but he was naturally unacquainted with the factor responsible for it. It should be Government's endeavour to withdraw more and more the control over their movement instead of stiffening such control and attempting to centralize power and responsibility in the Registrar. In our Presidency, we have found local supervising unions a valuable agency for decentralizing authority, building up internal strength and recruiting a class of responsible and representative rural leaders. The future of the movement depends more on these rural leaders than on any amount of efficient official direction, from Delhi or even from within a province itself. And the more affinity the movement possesses towards the other forces that go to build up New India the more vigour and life it will enjoy in future. I say this, in all humility, as one who, since his days of study were over, has been a co-operator first and last—and practically nothing else. Co-operation is, undoubtedly, one of the world forces seeking to build economic society more in accord with the dictates of humanity than the capitalist order which has apparently brought the whole world today to the brink of ruin. But co-operation has its limitations, both internal and external, and it is inconceivable that it can flourish in a social atmosphere which is hostile or apathetic. It must be the concern of co-operators, therefore, to bring about a change in the atmosphere by education and propaganda and by establishing live contact with other forces working in the same direction.

RELIEF WORK IN BIHAR.

The Mayor of Calcutta left for Bihar on February 2nd and after an aerial inspection of the devastated area returned to Calcutta on Monday (5th February). He issued the following statement to the Press:—

The scenes of utter devastation and ruin, which I have witnessed throughout North Bihar not only in the towns but also in the rural areas beggar description. In the principal towns of North Bihar such as Monghyr, Muzaffarpur, Durbhanga, Sitamari and Motihari the destruction of brick-built houses is practically complete. In Monghyr there is not one single house which has been left untouched. The Bazaar area—with its beautiful asphalted roads and long rows of masonry buildings attached to each other wall to wall, some of them three or four-storied, stocked with costly furniture and thickly populated, not only by the prominent residents but by customers who had come to the Bazar on account of Id festival and the Monday Fair,—now presents a long and continuous mass of ruins. Some of the roads have just been made slightly passable by the clearing of debris but the debris still remain in the same condition outside the roadway.

The relief organisations who are helping in the work of clearing the debris are doing their best and a small fleet of lorries sent from the Calcutta. Fort with the requisite staff are doing excellent work, removing the debris and throwing them out mostly into the moat of the Monghyr Fort. I was told that 400 tons of debris were thus cleared on Sunday by means of these lorries and two dead bodies were recovered in the process of clearing.

I had the advantage of coming into close contact with the work of the various relief organisations who have rushed to the help of unfortunate Monghyr with men and materials. I do not find words to express my appreciation adequately of the excellent work that these workers are doing throughout the day and night including patrol duties in the devastated areas, thus supplementing the work of the police. There may have been some amount of confusion during the first few days, which was inevitable in the face of a terrible disaster of such unprecedented magnitude and intensity. It is also true that during those days the middle-class population, both Behari and Bengali, who would not come to the relief centres even at the risk of starvation, did not receive that amount of attention which could have been given to them under somewhat more normal circumstances. I made a special point of inquiring not only in Monghyr but also in Muzaffarpur as to their needs and whether they were being met. I raised this question in my interview with His Excellency the Governor, who was very sympathetic on this question and agreed that the sentiments of the middle-class sufferers should be respected. The same question was raised by me in the course of my discussion with the Commissioners and District Magistrates both of Muzaffarpur and of Bhagalpur Divisions at Monghyr.

In Muzaffarpur the relief parties from Calcutta as well as the representatives and workers of the Bihar Central Relief Committee assured me that they were taking special interest for the sufferers belonging to the middle-classes. An organisation of local Bengali youngmen supported by assistance from Calcutta have been doing, with limited resources, very good work in that direction. In Monghyr I had discussion with the leading relief organisations the names of whom it would be invidious to mention, but some of whom—from Calcutta and Bihar,—assured me that in spite of their communal namns they were taking special interest for the relief of middle-class sufferers, unswayed by any communal considerations. I also spoke to Mrs. Lilavati Mitra, a highly respectable lady of Monghyr, who had been visiting the middle-class families at Manghyr and carrying relief to their very door. At Monghyr I raised this question before the Commissioner and the District Magistrate. The District Magistrate, who seems to have been taking a good deal of personal interest in relief work, promised to me that he would at once place an experienced Bengali Deputy Magistrate to look after this particular branch of relief work, namely rendering assistance to middle-class families who could not come to the relief centres.

At Patna, on the day of my arrival, I mentioned to Babu Rajendra Prasad the complaints which had reached Calcutta from middle-class sufferers and invited his attention to that matter. Babu Rajendra Prasad at once agreed that it was extremely helpful to get such information conveyed to him, so that he might investigate into the matter and remedy the defects, if any. I must observe that the work that Babu Rajendra Prasad is doing without the slightest regard for his own health and comfort can be expected only from a man like him. I am convinced that so far as Babu Rajendra Prasad is concerned, he is not only inspired by the desire of dealing out relief to whomsoever in need, but is taking every possible step to ensure that his ideas and intention for even distribution of relief are carried into execution in every corner of the province.

If there has been any falling off in the standard at any particular place it is to a certain extent inevitable in such a great undertaking. I do not suggest that there was no cause for complaint anywhere; on the other hand some of the sufferers whom I personally met complained of just grievances, but it was generally agreed by the residents of standing position and respectability as well as by the devoted workers themselves that the cause for complaint had considerably lessened and was fast disappearing.

One word about the devastation in the rural areas where lands have been submerged under sands thrown out from the fissures along with the sub-soil water which came out of them. The desert-like appearance which the entire countryside presented was heart-rending. Huge pools and lakes of sub-soil water thrown out of these fissures have been formed on the surface. Wells have become choked by sand and in many cases the masonry work has been completely destroyed. People are drinking the sub-soil water, which is stagnating from day to day, pointing to a new danger of epidemic disease.

The immediate need in the countryside is the provision of tube-wells upon which the authorities in Muzaffarpur district are fast concentrating. The reclamation of lands and the future cultivation thereof is a tremendous job, particularly in view of the change that has been brought about in the contour of the earth surface making the restoration of communication extremely difficult. The approach of the monsoon brings another potential danger and difficulty and the Government and the popular relief workers—who have combined in excellent co-operation inspired by one common ideal of service and sacrifice—will have to husband all their resources in providing shelter to homeless and water and means of subsistence to the people of the affected areas.

I have returned with first-hand experience overwhelmed with a sense of the immensity of the task. I have no doubt that my countrymen and the Government and the Local Authorities will continue to respond to the call of humanity in that magnificent spirit which is the great redeeming feature of this terrible catastrophe.

MADAME CURIE. *

Marie Sklodowska, the future Madame Curie, was born in Warsaw in 1867. Her father was a teacher of mathematics and physics in secondary schools, her mother, headmistress of a girl's school. She lost her mother when she was nine years old. Her father became her tutor, teacher and friend. She learned to read at four, playing with cardboard letters with her sister, who was two years older. Nobody knew when and how she mastered the art of reading. It was a great sensation in the family circle. Everybody plied the child with questions, how it happened. "It is really not my fault," answered the child, nearly crying.

She left school at 15, with a golden medal, and two years afterwards she took a place as private governess with a family in the country. She was obliged to do so, on account of the family's difficulties. Working, she not only ceased to be a burden to her father, but helped her elder sister, who was studying medicine in Paris.

After some time, she returned to Warsaw, working further as private governess, but her life's dream was to go abroad and continue her studies. For the time being, she worked at the Physical Laboratory of the Trade and Industry Museum in Warsaw.

Her great desire was at last realised in 1891. She went to Paris to study at the Sorbonne. As a student she occupied a little room on the 6th floor, which she kept tidy herself, without the help of any charwoman, and where she cooked her own meals. She worked at her studies with passionate zeal.

She finished the physico-mathematical studies in two years, and at the end of the third, she obtained a diploma of mathematics. She used to say at this epoch, that she only felt well when working 14 hours a day. She obtained a scholarship for her studies, which she afterwards entirely repaid from her first earnings.

When she finished her studies in Paris, she returned to Poland, wishing to stay and work in her native country. Professor Witkowski, an eminent physicist of the Cracow University, tried to get her a place as assistant at the University. But at that time women were not admitted even to such modest posts in Universities. She was therefore obliged to return to Paris, where she could find work in her special subject. It was very painful to her, as she was and is very much attached to her native country. Before giving a definite answer to the man she loved, she hesitated a long time, as she writes in her book: "It was not easy, for me to decide," says she, "because it would mean giving up the idea of living in Poland."

However, four years after having finished her studies, she married Pierre Curie. Love united them, mutual love, and also the love they both felt for scientific work and research. Pierre Curie, who always feared that marriage would hamper him in his work, used to say that his wife was a Godsend to him. They had the same humanitarian ideals and the same scientific dreams. Fate allowed them to realise those dreams and those ideals. After their marriage, they took a little flat of three rooms. The conditions in which they worked were extremely difficult. Their laboratory consisted of an unheated shed in the courtyard of the Municipal "Ecole de Physique", where Pierre Curie was laboratory assistant. One of the professors, writing to Madame Curie on the 25-th anniversary of the discovery of radium, mentions this shed, saying it was "a stable, open to all winds." In this stable, radium was discovered. After the discovery of radium, Pierre Curie was nominated professor of the Sorbonne: his wife became head of his laboratory. Their married life lasted 11 years, never separated. Once, being obliged to leave his wife for a few days, Pierre Curie wrote in a letter to her: "I am thinking about my beloved one who fills my whole life." They were united in life, united in work to a common purpose. They had two daughters. They were happy.

And suddenly a dreadful thing happened. Pierre Curie died tragically in 1906, run over by a heavy cart. The cruelty of blind and illogio Fate deprived Madame Curie of her best friend. The reaction was such, as was usual in this family, so often scourged by Fate, a frantic passion of work.

This frail woman of delicate health was endowed with superhuman energy. She took her husband's vacated chair at the Sorbonne, carrying on all the work she had previously started in her laboratory. She ordered and completed her husband's manuscripts and proceeded to the publication of his works.

She did not neglect the education of her two daughters, the youngest of whom was then two years old, devoting to this much time and care. She found time and strength for everything.

She is working until now in the so-called "Curie Foundation" a State foundation of France, consisting of a biological, and a physico-chemical department, a laboratory, a therapeutic establishment and so on. She is at the head of this institution, continuing to give lectures at the chair of radioactivity, a chair specially created at the Sorbonne for her husband.

Almost from the beginning of her scientific career, Madame Curie devoted herself to the problem of radioactivity, a new problem of physics, the foundations of which have been laid by Pierre Curie and his wife. Only after her husband's death did she obtain really desirable conditions for work. In her book "Pierre Curie", which is a sort of memoir, she goes back now and then to the melancholy complaint, that work could not go on as it should, for want of appropriate room, materials, assistants, and so on. After the discovery of radium and polonium came honours and distinctions. Madame Curie received jointly with her husband the Noble Prize of physics. She received it afterwards a second time alone for chemistry. She has been nominated Member of the Academy of Medical Science in Paris, and so on. All funds from these prizes were used to create better conditions of work. Those two people were most exceptionally disinterested. They never derived any material profits for themselves from their discovery. Radium was for them an "object of public usefulness". Other people made big fortunes on this discovery, they did not even try to get it patented.

Not only would they not derive from it material profits. They proved the same disinterestedness as to scientific ambitions. They gladly imparted all the details of their research to the scientific world, facilitating to other scientists further research on radioactivity and helping them to make new discoveries. They never accepted any orders or distinctions and did not attach any importance to such matters.

The income of Madame Curie is derived only from her professor's salary, and from the pension, granted to her by France as national gift on the occasion of the 25-th anniversary of the discovery of radium.

Only to prove what tremendous efforts this discovery cost, one could mention the fact that Madame Curie was obliged to proceed 10,000 times to crystallisation processes, in order to obtain a small particle of pure radium. (1 ton of ore contains but a few decigrams of radium). These 10,000 chemical manipulations were necessary to separate by crystallisation pure radium from other elements. This meant most exhausting physical work. Madame Curie offered the radium, thus obtained by the work of her own hands, to the Institute which she herself organised and in which she is working until now. In 1921 she was invited to America. A group of women there, with the American journalist Mrs. Maloney at their head, considered it their duty to help the great woman scientist in her splendid work. They presented her with one gramme of radium which was then worth 75,000 $ (now 60,000 $). This radium has been offered by Madame Curie to her Institute. It gave her possibilities of further research. The next gramme of radium, offered to her in 1929, has been given by Madame Curie to the Polish Radiologic Institute, created in Warsaw, according to her wish. It was Mrs. Maloney again who collected the funds for this one gramme.

Madame Curie was and is greatly attached to her native country. It was a great pain to her, when she finished her studies, not to be able to work in Poland. She taught her husband Polish and he mastered this difficult language so well, that he was able to correspond in Polish with his wife's family.

Madame Curie has two daughters. The elder, Irene, followed her mother's profession, she is a chemist and married a Frenchman, her fellow-student, also a chemist. They are working together, with already very important results. The younger daughter, Eve, unmarried, very pretty, has studied music. She works as journalist and shows considerable talent.

Madame Curie's home atmosphere is quiet and earnest, charming by its wonderful simplicity. Madame Curie receives very little. It was the same during her husband's life. They never had time for such things as society life. They were always absorbed by their work and needed quiet.

During her youth, when she lived in Warsaw or in the country, she was very much interested in social work. She propagated instruction among factory girls and country women. During the war, staying in France, she devoted much of her time to the war victims. She organised several motor car Roentgen stations. Summoned by surgeons, she hastened personally to the medical stations near the front, often risking her own life. She prepared tubes with radium emanations for the wounded, which is a process very dangerous for the health. In this work her daughter Irene was a great help to her. No wonder, true friendship and deepest understanding unite mother and daughter.

Madame Curie considers idealistic motives as the most important in life. She brought into her own home the spirit in which she herself has been educated. Her calm and self-possession are wonderful. In writing about her married life, she says: "if we often missed means and comfort, we had peace, a thing which little could disturb." After the death of her beloved husband, she remained faithful to his moral attitude, expressed in those words of his "Whatever may happen, even if one should be left as a body without soul, one must work on."

Madame Curie is not actively involved in the feminist movement, but her conviction was and always is that full and equal rights are due to women.

Madame Curie possessed in her youth some literary gift. She translated some French poems into Polish. Her interests were very wide, but she never had the time to distract her attention from her main purpose. She could never afford any distractions. Her favourite pastime was going for long walks in the country with her husband. She also practised some sports, such as rowing, swimming and skating. Even now she swims very well. She can drive a motor-car. Only recently has she been persuaded by her family to engage a chauffeur on account of her sight.

Madame Curie is not interested in food. She is extremely frugal and simple in her tastes. The problem of clothes never existed for her, till recently, when her youngest daughter, Eve, began to tyrannise over her in this respect, according to the word of Dr. Dluska, the sister of Madame Curie. Her only passion is for flowers. She has a little house on the Riviera, on the solitary sea-side at Cavalaire, where she personally grows flowers, and is always completing her beautiful little garden by some new acquisitions. Her dream is to have a little house near Paris, where she could live for always. Thus she would be able to look on trees and to grow her beloved flowers.

Madame Curie has still another great wish to be able to devote a part of her priceless time for work in Poland. For the moment, this is impossible. There is no chair of radiology on any of the Polish Universities. An Institute of her name has been created in Warsaw, as a gift of the nation in homage to Madame Curie. This Institute chiefly owes its existence to the energy and the efforts of Dr. Dluska, sister of Madame Curie. It is not however quite finished. The physical laboratory, where Madame Curie could find her field of work is not yet completed. Only the medical division, a most important one, is already active. At Madame Curie's request, a little flat has been prepared for her in this Institute. In the park surrounding the Institute, a monument of Madame Curie has been erected, the work of a woman sculptor, Madame Nitsch. The likeness of the features is wonderful. She sits there, a frail shape cast in bronze, her hands folded quietly on her lap over a book, her eyes looking away into the space. Calm, modesty and serenity emanate from this figure. We feel, looking at this monument, and thinking about her work, that Madame Curie is not only a great scientist, but that she is also a symbol of great beauty, a symbol of dauntless, disinterested super-human endeavour.

Miss Nila Cram Cook :—This lady known also as Nila Nagini embarked on a ship in Calcutta on the 10th February to return to America. She got aboard with her eyes tightly closed and refused all interviews. Her little son accompanied her.

Bombay Medical Women for Bihar :—The Bombay Branch of the Association of Medical Women is to be congratulated on the promptness with which, on getting an urgent message from Babu Rajendra Prasad, they managed to send immediately a contingent of six medical women headed by the well known doctor and social worker, Dr. Miss Kashibai Nowrange, to do relief work among the purdah women in the affected areas of Bihar. Mrs. Sarojini Naidu helped to secure the necessary funds for their equipment from the central committee.

THE TRAFFIC IN CONTRACEPTIVES.*

(By ELIZABETH H. GARRETT.)

The supporters of birth control meeting in Washington January 15 find themselves in a paradoxical situation. They are obliged at one and the same time to advocate more and less birth control. They are advocating more, in that they are fostering the opening of birth-control clinics, instructing doctors in contraceptive technique and attempting to influence Congress to pass a bill permitting contraceptive supplies and information to be sent through the mails and by express to doctors, medical schools and hospitals. They are advocating less, in that they find it necessary to warn the public against the increasing flood of contraceptive products, ranging in quality from good to very bad, but for the most part quite inferior, which are being openly sold all over the country, in drug stores, by peddlers and by mail.

Twenty years ago, when Margaret Sanger first became convinced, as a result of her work as a nurse in the slums of New York City, that women should know how to limit the size of their families, the problem seemed to her simply one of free speech. If doctors and nurses only dared tell these poor women what they know.....Later, in her own pursuit of knowledge, she discovered that the doctors and nurses themselves did not know of any simple, safe, method that could be used effectively by women with varying intelligence and limited facilities.

In 1913 and again in 1914-15 Mrs. Sanger went abroad and studied the new methods that had been evolved in France, England and Holland. It was in the last country, where birth-control clinics had been functioning over a period of years with a high degree of success, that the most progress had been made. Mrs. Sanger learned the Dutch methods from their chief exponent, Dr. Johannes Rutgers, and returned to America armed with the knowledge.

The next few years were devoted to intensive propaganda. Largely as a result, the prevention of conception, once an obscure and unmentionable subject, became a topic of open—and heated—discussion all over the country. Mrs. Sanger made the nation birth-control conscious. And in so doing she prepared the ground for the commercial exploitation that was to come. So long as contraception was wholly unknown and tabu, saleswomen could not get very far with their prospects. But when "birth control" became a familiar and at least partially respectable term, all that was needed to induce a woman to order contraceptive wares by mail, or to buy them from peddlers, or to ask her druggist for them, was skillful advertising.

In 1928 the Birth Control Clinical Research Bureau opened in New York City, with a woman physician as medical director. This clinic gave contraceptive instruction and supplied with materials any married woman who needed this information for the cure or prevention of disease, this restriction being rendered necessary by the wording of the New York State law. The method taught in the majority of cases was learned by Mrs. Sanger in Holland—the use of a rubber device in conjunction with an antiseptic jelly. The device came in different sizes and had to be fitted to the individual patient by the physician.

But neither device or jelly was being manufactured in the United States, and the federal law strictly forbade the importation of any medicine or article for preventing conception. What was to be done? The Clinic promptly set about trying to find a manufacturer who would be willing to make these articles for them. Strangely enough, in view of later developments, they found this difficult. No manufacturer was willing to produce an article which seemed likely to get him into trouble with the government and which could at first enjoy only a limited sale, since it had to be dispensed by physicians most of whom were ignorant of the method. Finally a firm agreed to undertake the job if some other company would distribute the goods.

By 1925 several other clinics had opened and doctors were beginning to take an interest in the new method, so the manufacturers met with a gratifying demand. In 1928 the distributing company began manufacturing its own materials and another company was formed to distribute the rubber device of the original firm and to manufacture jelly. A few other concerns began entering the field at about this time.

Now these first firms had high ethical standards. They were in fact, non-commercial in character, since their officers were for the most part men and women who had been active in the birth-control movement and were chiefly interested in seeing the newly opened clinics get supplies of good quality. And because they sold only to the medical profession, their profits were necessarily limited. But their employees were not always so social-minded. They were lured by the prospect of big profits to be made by selling to the general public. The rubber device, to be sure, could not be very widely sold, since it had to be fitted to the individual, but no such restriction limited the sale of jellies. These did not form a reliable method when used alone, but at that they were better, on the whole, than the chemicals—tablets and powders—that had been on the market for years. So sales managers and shipping clerks who had learned some of their company's trade secrets went off and started rival jelly manufacturing concerns of their own.

At about this time a legal case occurred which was to establish the rights of contraceptive manufacturers. A "prophylactic" concern with a nationwide business sued a rival for infringement of trademark. The question arose whether the business was a legal one, entitled to protection of its trademark. The decision was in favour of the plaintiff, stating that the business was legal in so far as sales were confined to druggists and to jobbers who agree to sell only to drug stores. The decision, moreover, suggested that the sending of contraceptive supplies or information through the mails would not be a violation of the federal laws unless this material was to be used illegally.

This decision, handed down in 1930, opened wide the door of opportunity to the contraceptive manufacturers. Up to this time they had been afraid to advertise; now they sent circulars through the mails to doctors, druggists and the general public, and began placing advertisements in magazines. Fortunately for them, the term "feminine hygiene" had been coined shortly before. By diligent and untiring efforts they made this innocuous-sounding phrase, to which the government had no objection, synonymous in the public mind with "contraception." Hence the present ambiguous situation: You may advertise any and every kind of contraceptive product, but you must not speak of "contraception" or "birth control." You may speak of "feminine hygiene" or, more recently, "marriage hygiene," and make your meaning clear by references to "protection" and "security."

When it was perceived that, by a judicious use of language, contraceptive wares could be advertised and distributed as freely as any other class of goods, there was a big rush to horn in on the profits.

Dozens of jellies were put out, and the brands of many old-fashioned products multiplied rapidly. Manufacturers of antiseptics ran national advertising campaigns to get their products used as contraceptives. The "prophylactic" concerns shared in the general expansion, their business becoming four or five times what it had been fifteen years before.

Peddling is on the increase, and the methods employed are often highly unscrupulous. One concern, for instance, sends women around selling a mechanical device that needs to be fitted by a physician to be effective and has these women advise the customer that if the article does not fit she can get it changed at the nearest birth-control clinic. Another concern has been sending its saleswomen among the very poor to peddle a certain intra-uterine device that is dubious enough even when fitted by a physician and is almost sure to cause serious trouble when placed by the woman herself.

The advertising campaigns of the manufacturers of antiseptics are, from the public-health point of view, peculiarly unfortunate. The simple use of an antiseptic is one of the most ineffective of contraceptive methods and is condemned by gynecologists. Yet public ignorance of contraceptive technique is such that high-pressure advertising on the part of a few big firms has resulted in the widespread use of their products as contraceptives. Moreover, some of these antiseptics are dangerous if employed in too strong solution, as they might be in the hands of a woman not fully instructed in their use; though some of the most widely circulated women's magazines have carried full-page advertisements of such products.

What has happened is that the contraceptive business has outgrown the birth-control movement. Today advertisers are appealing to a public still generally ignorant of contraceptive technique and unable, for the most part, to obtain medical advice. The hospitals and doctors that do give such advice cannot, of course, advertise to the public, and neither, strangely enough, can the commercial firms that supply them—at least, not in any effective manner. One large house that sells to hospitals, clinics and physicians wanted to run an advertisement in some woman's magazine urging women to consult their doctors in regard to birth control. No magazine would consent to take this, though a number of them had been running advertisements of questionable "feminine hygiene" products. The reason underlying such editorial decisions is largely a legal one: "feminine hygiene" has been permitted to run unmolested; mentioning "birth control" might bring prosecution. This same fear of prosecution doubtless holds back many doctors in states where the physician's rights in this matter are not clearly defined.

It was such considerations that led Margaret Sanger to form a National Committee on Federal Legislation for Birth Control, which aims to obtain amendments exempting doctors, hospitals and clinics from the sections of the federal law pertaining to the prevention of conception. Bills to achieve this purpose are now pending in Congress, and the Washington birth-control conference has been convened at this particular time in order to mobilize public opinion in their favour. It is the Committee's belief that if federal restrictions are removed, states having similar laws will follow suit and physicians generally will then feel free to learn the best birth-control methods and to instruct patients requiring such advice in their use. As a result, the Committee believes, the control of contraceptive methods and products would tend to revert from the commercial interests to those best qualified to possess it—the doctors of the country.

THE TEMPLE ENTRY BILL.*

(By RAO SAHEB C. V. KRISHNASWAMI IYER Retired District Judge.)

The campaign which Mahatma Gandhi has begun, to preach anti-untouchability, will draw pointed attention to the bill, recently ordered by the Legislative Assembly to be circulated for eliciting opinion, relating to the entry into Hindu temples of certain classes who do not have the right to do so. Custom which is as good as statutes in Courts prevents their entrance now, and the object of the bill, to put it briefly, is to enable Hindus of certain qualifications resident in the locality where the temples are situated to throw open their doors to these excluded classes. That it will cause a notable change in the practice of ages is not and cannot be denied by any reasonable student of the problem. That there is a large body of persons—call them obscurantists or by any other name—who sincerely believe that this departure is not only not to the best interests of Hinduism but is positively dangerous, cannot also be questioned. The bill, therefore, requires to be carefully examined, and the objections to it should be met before the change contemplated by it is approved.

The real defect of the bill is in the provision it makes as to the method by which the opinion of the community is to be ascertained. Shortly put, the provision is that the Hindu voters of the locality for Municipal and Local Board purposes are to determine in the matter. For the qualifications of such voters the readers are referred to the Acts constituting the Local Boards and Municipalities. That provision in the bill, we think, is not satisfactory. To take it as it is, it does not say who is a Hindu voter. Nowhere is the term "Hindu" defined. Not even in the Acts referred to above. One knows that there is a great diversity of opinion as to who is a "Hindu." Not even the qualification that he should profess Hinduism at the time of the voting, as in Section 23 of the Hindu Religious Endowments Act, is put in. Does this omission mean, that if a person was born of Hindu parents, he would be entitled to vote? But even profession of Hinduism would not seem to be enough. Brahmos and Jains are for some purpose classed as Hindus. Are they to vote? There are good Hindus who have no faith in temple-worship and who do not care what becomes of idols and temples. Should they be allowed to vote? Obviously it will be unjust to allow even such Hindus to vote. As the bill stands now it is not clear that it does not allow Hindu voters of even the excluded classes to vote. They are also "Hindu" voters. That is obviously unjust, as they are likely to vote in their own favour. The basic principle on which the encroachment contemplated by the bill can be justified is that the majority of those who have the right to enter agree to it. The voting should be confined to those who have something to lose. So the excluded classes must be excluded for the purpose of voting, and some sort of confession of faith in worship of idols in temples and Agama Sastras should be insisted on. For example, a special list of worshippers may be prepared for this purpose, and each intending voter should be asked to file a sworn statement that he has such faith. According to the bill some property qualification is necessary, for such a qualification is prescribed both by the District Municipalities Act and District Boards Act for a voter. This is hard on the poor. There are often more pious men among the poor than among the rich. If in any case adult suffrage is to be adopted this would seem to be the proper case. The present rule prescribes a very narrow local circle for temples in municipalities and cities. Nearest to church, farthest from God. Dwellers in cities are often less attached to temples than those in the villages near them who go there oftener to worship. It would be better if an uniform limit of a 10 miles radius is fixed for the smaller temples and 100 miles radius for the bigger ones. Perhaps even wider circles may be required for temples like Tirupati and Rameswaram, though fixing all India for them is not practical politics. According to the present bill read with the Acts referred to above, 120 days' residence in a locality is enough. This may lead to migrations for the purpose of election. One year would be a fairer test. A bare majority is all that is prescribed by the bill. This will lead to election abuses. A two-thirds majority which is often prescribed even for less momentous decisions such as the unseating of an elected official, should be insisted on. If not, a rule like the rule for admission to clubs that one vote against admission or one black ball should count as much as 2 or 3 for admission or a white ball should be provided for. To prevent hasty decisions, a period of say one year should be allowed to elapse between the voting if it is for a change and its being giving effect to. In the meanwhile, on the deposit of the necessary expenses a fresh voting should be allowed to be called for once by the non-changers. All these amendments no doubt involve expense and delay and work. But in view of the importance of the change contemplated they should be faced, if injustice is not to be done to those who hold honest beliefs though they may be in a minority, and if enthusiasts are not to be allowed to create inconvenient and dangerous precedents though in this particular case they may be on the right side, and if no just room is to be given for bitterness. Will Sanatanists direct their energies in these directions, and not try to mop the Atlantic? Will they benefit by the fate of their wholesale objection to Mr. Sarda's bill?

MR. JADHAV'S BILL IN ASSEMBLY.

A Bill which seeks to abolish recognition of Hindu caste by Government and the courts, and to call all Hindus as "Brahmanas" has been given notice of in the Legislative Assembly by Mr. B. V. Jadhav, a member from Bombay.

In his statement of objects and reasons Mr. Jadhav says:—

"The Hindus originally were of one status. They were not divided into classes. Then they were called Hansas. They came to be divided into four varnas or classes, i.e., Brahmanas, Kshatriyas, Vaishyas and Sudras. At some later date, the Depressed Classes were so called, and were treated very harshly. In some parts of the country they were called 'Adi Sudras' and in others the 'Panchamas."

"The Hon. the Law Member pointed out during the debate on the Anti-Untouchability Bill, that the Depressed Classes must be given a definite status in Hindu Society. Some think that the status of Shudras should be assigned to them. But those who are classed as Shudras, will not admit them into their fold. The present division into four varnas is almost non-existent, as their place is taken by the various castes many of which are of very recent origin. It is the duty of a King, according to the Hindu Dharma Shastras, to assign a Varna to an individual or a body of individuals and to degrade them to a lower class. Under the present conditions, the Legislature ought to exercise that royal prerogative. It will be very convenient.

to refuse to recognise caste in Government records. With this object in view thousands of Hindus got themselves enumerated as Hindus. There are different provisions in the matter of inheritance and adoption according to the class of a person. All these cause a good deal of confusion and lead to bitterness and intercaste quarrels. Non-recognition of caste by Government and the courts is the only remedy. The Brahmins profess to be non-communal and above caste considerations in the service of their motherland. They will therefore support this Bill. All Hindus were called Hansas in the ancient times. 'Brahman' is a more intelligible term today and for that reason the Bill proposes to call all Hindus Brahmanas."

The following are the provisions of the Bill:

Whereas the Depressed Classes, otherwise called the Panchamas or Harijans are not recognised in the present administration of Hindu Laws.

Whereas the Varna system and its offshoots, the numerous castes are doing a deal of harm to the Hindus in general socially, politically, religiously, and in various other ways, and Whereas it will be difficult to raise the status of the Depressed Classes, by declaring them to be Shudras.

It is hereby enacted as follows:

1. This Act may be called "The Hindu Status Act."

2. It will come into operation from the date notified in the "Gazette of India" by the Governor General; and it will extend to all professing the Hindu religion and residing in British India.

3. All persons professing the Hindu religion, including the Depressed Classes, otherwise called the Panchamas or Harijans; shall henceforward be known as Brahmins and shall be governed by laws applicable to the Brahmanas.

PLACE OF INDIAN SYSTEM IN MUSICOLOGY.

Dr. A. A. Bake of the Leyden University, Holland, delivered a lecture at Government House, Bombay, on Wednesday evening on "the nature of research in Indian Music." The position of Indian music in the totality of the music of the Indo-European peoples, said the lecturer, was in many ways comparable with that of Sanskrit in the Indo-European languages. Sanskrit, as a language by itself, had been studied and analysed for at least 2,000 years in India, and the theoretic survey of it did not leave anything to be wished at all. The linguistic system was perfect.

When the Westerners came to India, they discovered this marvellous structure and started studying it, and were struck from the very beginning by the similarity between the phenomena in Sanskrit, and those with which they were acquainted in their own languages, not only the classics, Greek and Latin, but even the more modern ones, like Gothic, Slavonic, German, English and the Roman languages, French, Italian and so on.

Thus the study of Sanskrit initiated the study of comparative philology which achieved such marvellous results in the course of the last seven or eight decades, proving the relationship of groups of people who previously had been considered as having nothing common.

A thorough study of the Indian system of music would thus reveal its position in comparative musicology to be very much the same as that of Sanskrit in comparative philology. And, just as in Sanskrit, the study of Indian music might be taken up for its scientific value, but with equal justification for its intrinsic beauty.

India itself divided its music into two large divisions called marga and deci, in which marga represented the traditional classical music of divine origin, and deci just folk music, played and sung for the enjoyment of the people, without ulterior motive of attaining salvation. The fact that attaining salvation, the lecturer continued, was an aim of marga music was definitely stated in the Sanskrit texts, and was clearly visible even now in the first of the two sub-divisions of marga, viz.—the music of the Samaveda.

Without this important constituent of Vedic liturgy none of the larger Vedic offerings was complete. Its spiritual importance in the structure of Hindu religion in its oldest form was enormous. Samaveda was the only one of the three oldest Vedas of which music was an integral part. Not only that the laws of music, but also those of religious psychology, were illustrated in chants which were extremely strong and impressive in their stern beauty.

Of equally great importance was the second division marga music, which might be called India's classical music, a system that had its roots partly in Vedic music, partly in folk music and had a traceable history of at least a millennium and a half. It was here that the Indian theoreticians with their astonishingly sharp ear for phonetic phenomena had built up an admirable theory, closely akin to what was found in Greece.

In the extraordinary affinity of Indian and Greek music lay the explanation of the fact that the impact with Islam brought so few changes in the system of Indian music. In course of time musicians had more or less forgotten their own history; tradition had become a dead burden in many instances, and the practice of music had fallen into the hands of a class of artisans with hardly any culture at all.

A comprehensive study of both marga and deci music carried out with love and perseverance was what India needed. Only then would the goddess of music and learning be restored to her sublime throne, where she could receive the devotion of her worshippers. Then marga and deci music would be combined and would bestow liberation and enjoyment both in equal measures.

Progress in Hyderabad:—"A Hyderabad Hindu" writes in the Sind Observer: "When his Exalted Highness the Nizam assumed the reins of Government into his own hands there was an immense practical work to be done. The past 22 years of his administration have been indeed a period of unceasing activity, reforms and progress in all directions. There is no department of administration which has not shared his quickening impulse whether it concerns the economic development of the state, education, co-operation or industry or the growth of local self-government. The record of progress in educational, social, economic and other spheres is such that his Exalted Highness may legitimately feel proud of it and one may unhesitatingly assert that the Hyderabad state is destined to make further remarkable progress under his rule. Another prominent factor worth mentioning about Hyderabad is that there is no communal discord, all the communities living in terms of perfect friendship and amity and under his rule the state has been pursuing a career of uninterrupted development and progress. At the present moment when all the nations of the world are suffering from serious economic depression it is Hyderabad and Hyderabad alone which is in a happy position to face the present economic depression without anxiety. It is particularly due to the financial policy of the state which is widely known as the departmentalisation of the finance. Sir Akbar Hydari's management of the purse has bestowed prosperity on the people."

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF.

A colonisation scheme for the relief of the unemployed amongst the educated middle class Indians is being launched this year by the United Provinces Government as an experimental measure.

This was decided by a committee set up to inquire into the question of unemployment in the province. The meeting of the committee was presided over by Mr. J. P. Srivastav, Minister for Education, and was attended among others by Mr. Allen, Director of Agriculture, Raja Vishveswar-dayal Seth, Director of Co-operative Societies, and Nawab L. Hayat Khan, Deputy President of the Legislative Council.

The committee was on the whole convinced of the feasibility of the colonisation scheme but postponed for later consideration the big colonisation project on a few large tracts of land. Meanwhile it was decided to utilise half of the Government agricultural farm at Faizabad for the purpose of launching the scheme on an experimental basis the object of which will be to ascertain if the educated young men would be willing to settle down as farmers and whether that vocation would be a paying proposition to them.

The experiment will last for three years. In the first instance it will provide intensive practical training on business lines in agriculture, fruit and vegetable gardening, poultry farming and cattle breeding. The proposal provides for training for ten years of young men by allotting to them ten acres of land each for a period of three years under a clear understanding that they will have to move out after that period to make room for others by finding land for permanent settlement somewhere themselves.

The farm will be treated purely as an instructional colony. Government will provide the settlers with a planned farming with necessary expert advice and supervision, facilities for taqavi loans on easy instalment system for seeds, implements, bullocks and wells etc, and also residential accommodation.

Five settlers will be on individualistic lines, while others will be on the system of collective co-operation. It is understood that the Director of Agriculture will be shortly inviting applications from prospective settlers.

REVIEWS IN BRIEF.

A Tribute to Gokhale:—In the latest addition to the "Builders of Modern India Series" published by the Association Press, Calcutta, Mr. John S. Hoyland pays a tribute to Gokhale. The volume consists largely of quotations from speeches with explanatory paragraphs from the author's pen. Mr. Hoyland remarks in his preface to "Gopal Krishna Gokhale" (Paper Rs. 1-8, Cloth Rs. 2/8) on "the urgent need that this great man should come into his own and be appreciated as amongst the greatest of all the builders of Modern India." In assessing Gokhale's influence in present day politics, however, the author has been led into a serious error. "It is perhaps true", he writes, "that the Indian extremists hated Gokhale worse even than they hated the British...In consequence Gokhale has not come into his own. Probably another generation will have to pass before it begins to be recognised of what eminence where the benefits which this college professor conferred upon his Motherland." In his concluding pages he writes, "With his great natural power, and force of character he might have ridden the whirl wind, denouncing the iniquities of the West, and telling a people always ready to listen to such appeals that they must separate themselves from all these abomination." We should like know which Indian leader has done this and when Mr. Hoyland found Indians "always ready to listen to such appeals." However interesting they may be as a pastime, all attempts at discussing the probable conduct of dead leaders are futile. Our author has failed to inform his readers of the change that has come over Indo-British relations since Gokhale's death, and we are afraid English readers will conclude from the book that the problems of today are exactly what Gokhale faced.

A Conversion Play:—Mr. S. A. Das has published a play entitled "Lead Kindly Light" (The Modern Printing Works, Calcutta, Price Rs. 2/-) dealing with the problems facing an Indian Christian paterfamilias of liberal religious views, whose family unfortunately are conventional Indian Christians. The situation is further complicated by the fact that the hero of the story has a kindred spirit in a Sanskrit scholar who introduces the all-inclusive ideas of Hinduism in his conversation. The play keeps a sustained interest in the theme till the end, at any rate, so far as the reading of it is concerned. In acting, however, some of the passages would be found extremely lengthy.

A Book of Short Stories :—Mr. A. S. P. Iyer, who is well-known as an author, in the "Finger of Destiny" (publishers G. V. K. Swami and Co., Kumbakonam, Price Re. 1/-) gives us six tales indicative of modern influence. Mr. Iyer is an experienced writer and he introduces references to present-day events to add spice to his narration. The lengthy dialogues, however, detract in places from the interest of the book.

A Poem on Untouchability :—Dr. E. Peters has published through the Basel Mission Press, Mangalore, a lengthy poem of two thousand and odd lines dealing with the untouchability question. The main thesis of the "Cry of the Bereft" is that the untouchables ought to be allowed to develop along their own line instead of attempting "to merge them into Hindu society." Dr. Peters' verse gives evidence of the author's sincerity even though it does not carry conviction and falters often in its metre. In fact, there are portions of this poem which might be mistaken for humorous verses.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

H. H. The Aga Khan on Communalism and Democracy :—Discussing the general political situation with a representative of the Associated Press on the 7th His Highness the Aga Khan said that for the present communal electorates should be accepted by all the parties concerned. But he was definitely of the opinion that the practical experience of the working of democratic institutions, which were going to be introduced in the country by the forthcoming Reforms, would make both Muslims and Hindus realise that neither of them stood to gain anything by a perpetuation of communalism in the political sphere in any form whatsoever. The dawning of this realisation would spontaneously sound the death-knell of communal electorates which, he said, were a necessary evil under present circumstances. Similarly, it would be sheer waste of time and energy to strive to get the Communal Award altered so long as an equally good, if not better, alternative scheme, which would satisfy all sections of political opinion, was not put forward before the country. Experience and practice of parliamentary Government will show that communal Government was an impossibility and that the working of the reforms would lead to political parties being formed and the adjustment of communal claims by mutual consent and compromise.

Hindu-Javanese Art :—A lecture on Hindu-Javanese Bronzes was delivered on January 24 before the India Society by Dr. A. J. Bernet Kempers, Reader in Comparative Archaeology of Greater India in the University of Leyden. He explained that Hindu-Javanese art was created and developed by a people descended partly from Indians and partly from Indonesians. Consequently it contains elements from two distinct cultures. One of the most interesting problems of Javanese history is the study of the ways in which these elements became forged into a new entity. Compared with the abundance of Indian elements the Indonesian ones, which are found in some examples, are of little importance. The cause of the peculiar character of the ancient Javanese bronzes, therefore, is not the presence of Indonesian features but the fact that the elements inherited or received from India have been combined, changed, modified, and above all elevated into a perfect and harmonious fullness. Sir Frances Young-husband presided, and Mr. Hon. W. G. A. Ormsby-Gore joined in the discussion.

NOTES

Independence and Sedition:—Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru was sentenced to two years' imprisonment for sedition by the Chief Presidency Magistrate of Calcutta. The Pandit said that he was convinced and declared in his speeches that India must have Independence and that if that was sedition he pleaded guilty to the charge. The learned Magistrate held that this clearly implied hostility to Government and convicted the Pandit. The Pandit's prosecution has been criticised as showing want of imagination on the part of the Bengal Government. On the other hand, we think that it shows too much imagination. The Bengal Government may retort that it showed the truest imagination in clapping the popular Pandit in jail and that its action could not fail to impress the people as an exhibition of power even at a time of dire calamity in a neighbouring province. What the public are really concerned to know is, was the Magistrate right in inferring hostility to Government as necessarily implied in the desire for Independence? If a son who has reached adult age wants to set up an independent home for himself, would that mean necessarily or even normally hostility to his parents? The British Government has always professed that it is training India to govern herself. Some of the British statesmen who founded the Indian Empire even declared that their aim was to prepare India to be independent in course of time. Neither Macaulay nor Munro would have agreed that the salvation of India depended on her remaining with Britain for all time. It is important that the point should be authoritatively settled, whether it is sedition to hold and declare that Indian salvation must come through independence. The Indian National Congress when it passed the Independence Resolution was not considered guilty of sedition and even to-day it has not been declared an illegal body. The Pandit will not appeal against his conviction but we believe the High Court of Calcutta may of its own motion take up the matter if the Bar Council can take the initiative, as has been done in some cases.

A New Caste:—While critics of the Hindu social system have been pointing to caste as the crowning proof of India's unfitness for self-government and Indian reformers have been labouring to restore it to its original form of functional grouping, it is interesting to observe the formation of a new caste under our eyes. The Government of India have issued orders bearing on the conduct of Government servants, which we publish in another column. One of them, as we understand it, makes it obligatory on the part of a Government servant not only to prevent every member of his family (in a joint family, there may be a score or more) from taking part in any activity which tends directly or indirectly to be subversive of the Government established by law. But it also lays upon him the duty of informing his superior officer he knows or even suspects that a member of his family is connected with or interested in such movements. The possibilities suggested by this rule are vast and interesting and may even be amusing. We are, however, concerned for the moment with the sociological aspect of the orders. If these orders add to the duties of Government servants, others are under consideration to add to their privileges. The Leader of Allahabad published a message from its correspondent in New Delhi which we also publish. It is under consideration, we are told, to amend the civil law so as to protect officers who are in debt from having their salaries and allowances attached when they are enjoying a hard-earned holiday. The two sets of orders together—duties balanced by privileges—form a perfect example of the basic principle of caste. Old Manu lives again in New Delhi.

Kemal Pasha and Religion:—The Bombay Chronicle published a very important communication from a correspondent on Wednesday. It related to the celebration of the Ramzan-Id this year in Turkey. The measures adopted by the Turkish Republic to westernise manners and to put down orthodox opposition created the impression that the new regime and its leaders were opposed to religion. This has no doubt influenced to some extent the handful of "rationalists" in this country. They will be surprised to learn that the Turkish Dictator accompanied by his high officials attended 'Id prayers at the Juma Mosque at Angora and delivered an address in which he exhorted his countrymen to stick to their religion and to love their country. Two explanations may be given of this apparently sudden recognition of the importance of religion to the Turkish nation. One is that the leader of the Turkish Revolution felt obliged to keep religion in the background until he had established his authority against the opposition of the orthodox priesthood. The other is that, as the result of experience, he has come to realise that the Turkish nation can not be completely consolidated without the consent of religion. It is on their religious life, that nations repose, wrote Bryce in his Holy Roman Empire. Without religion the new nation which the genius of Kemal Pasha has created, will not easily settle down to the new order. The second explanation is probably the right one. If so, it reflects fresh credit on the Ghazi's patriotism and statesmanship.

The Depressed Classes and Temple Entry:—We published last week an article on the Temple Entry Bill pointing out some of its defects and suggesting certain modifications relating mainly to the referendum. The writer showed clearly the disadvantages of attempting to carry out reforms with the consent of the conservative elements of society. If you would have the question of admitting the untouchables into Hindu temples decided by vote it is but fair that the right to vote be restricted to those who usually resort to temples. That the result of such a referendum will necessarily be against the admission does not affect the issue although it naturally rouses the opposition of the progressive sections. The dispute over the electorates is really an attempt on both sides to secure a clear decision in its favour. The only way of effectively carrying out this reform is not to wait for the approval of the orthodox but to decide on the merits of the case and place legislation on the subject on this basis. Such a policy is possible, neither for a democracy nor for a bureaucracy which in social matters seeks clear cut majorities before acting. In view of this, there is another alternative, to tackle the question indirectly. The intensive agitation in favour of temple-entry has tended to obscure the fact that it is only one aspect of the question of the uplift of untouchables. Owing to the stress laid hitherto on its emotional side, public opinion has based its judgment of the progress of depressed class reform work on the number of temples opened to the lower castes. Inevitably the more solid achievements in the educational, sanitary and economic spheres are unnoticed and in places such work has even been neglected. Mr. Starte, Backward Class Officer, in his interesting Report for 1932-3, expresses the hope that recruitment in the Public Services of depressed classes men, will lead to a better social status and to the abolition of caste restrictions in matters of wells, roads and public institutions. It is not often, however, that improvement in the status of a few individuals brings about advantages to an entire community. Now however that the question of temple-entry has been raised same solution must be formed for it. Orthodox Hindus have expressed their opposition to temple entry but in doing so they have been careful to explain that they are no less desirous of improving the lot of the depressed classes than the reformers socially, and work along these lines should make greater headway than it is doing at present.

The Second Generation:—We have dealt with the legal aspect of the conviction of Pandit Jawharlal Nehru in another note. It has a human side as well. The Chief Presidency Magistrate Mr. Sinha is a son of a great Indian nationalist, the late Lord Sinha. The Pandit is the son of another equally great leader, the late Pandit Motilal Nehru. The coincidence is remarkable. This is the second generation. What will the third be?

The Test Matches:—Writing of the so-called test matches after they were played in Bombay, we ventured to express our doubts about their serving the laudable purpose intended by their promoters. We are sorry to see that our doubts have not proved altogether uncalled for. The reports and comments in the Press show that the most that can be claimed is that the test matches have not materially affected the relations between the Indian and British communities. This is chiefly due to the fact that an Englishman who umpired in two of the matches has been the foremost and severest critic of the methods of the English team. Mr. Frank Tarrant has really saved the situation from taking a communal aspect. If other Englishmen in this country take an independent line in matters of controversy, whatever politicians may say or do, there will be little chance of the race issue obtruding itself into Indo-British relations.

Earthquake Relief:—We publish this week Babu Rajendra Prasad's article on the problem of administering relief to the earthquake victims. He warns the public of the dangers of indiscriminate charity and urges the necessity of impressing on the people of the devastated areas the fact that though the earthquake may have left them destitute it has not made them resourceless. Viewed in the light of his exhortation the help rendered by other provinces is welcomed as a valuable supplement to the efforts of the victims themselves. Babu Rajendra Prasad appeals for the construction of a better Bihar on the ruins of the old. Another statement on the extent of the suffering inflicted on Nepal was given in a press interview last week. General Shumshere Singh gave us the reassuring news that Nepal had not suffered to the extent that Bihar had from the earthquake. Nepal has already been assured of Indian sympathy and we trust that relief will be extended to that country.

BOMBAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1934.

CHRISTIAN COLLEGES IN INDIA.

A Reuter's telegram of the 15th reported that a meeting at the Lambeth Palace of the Committees formed under the Presidency of Lord Halifax to appeal for Christian Colleges in India, decided to launch an appeal at a meeting at Mansion House on 1st March when the Lord Mayor will preside. The Archbishop of Canterbury will be among the speakers. It is stated that the immediate need is the reconstruction and extension of six colleges. The Archbishops of Canterbury and York, Mr. Baldwin, Sir Samuel Hoare and the Viceroy are among the supporters of the appeal. The Archbishops' support calls for no remark. Lord Halifax (Lord Irwin) is an ex-viceroy and the limitations attaching to the position no longer exist in his case. As members of the British Cabinet, he and Mr. Baldwin are bound by the principle of religious neutrality which is the basis of British rule in this country. This is more particularly the case with Sir Samuel Hoare who, as Secretary of State for India, is directly responsible for upholding the underlying principles of British rule; and still more so in the case of the Viceroy who is the head of the administration and His Majesty's representative in this country. We daresay these high officials have satisfied themselves that by supporting this appeal they are not doing anything contrary to the principle of religious neutrality and they are most unlikely to change their opinion whatever may be urged to the contrary. Nevertheless it is our duty to point out that so long as the primary object of these institutions is to substitute Christianity for the ancient religious faiths of the country, support to them means support of their propaganda and not merely of their purely educational activities.

To obviate the possibility of misconception, we quote the following passage from the Report of the Commission on Christian Higher Education in India presided over by Dr. A. D. Lindsay, which was published three years ago and was the outcome of an extended enquiry into the working of Christian Colleges in this country. "We have seen in considering the India of the present day," the Commissioners observe, "that Hinduism and Islam are largely losing their hold over the mind of the ordinary student and are being replaced by an irreligious materialism: that there is little in either Hinduism or Islam which can resist the irreligious influences of economic and psychological determinism." Then, again, "If the Scriptures are still regarded by all as the spearhead, there is no longer a well-fitted handle. We have got to see whether we can remake a handle to the spearhead, and we have got to see whether we can combat those influences in the system which, so far from helping, make against the Christian purpose of the Colleges." We do not know on what evidence other than the disinterestedly interested one of Christian Missionary Professors, Dr. Lindsay and his colleagues formed their opinion that Hinduism and Islam were largely losing their hold on the mind of the ordinary student in India. If this was true and so far as it is true, the Missions, having themselves been actively engaged in bringing about this result, should regard their work, including educational work, as having succeeded; whereas the Commission was appointed to enquire why it has failed. It is altogether false to say that Hinduism and Islam have lost their hold on the ordinary Indian student. On the contrary, the great religions of India, reformed of their excrescences and enriched by nationalism, have a stronger hold today on the youth of India than at any previous time. The Mission Colleges themselves, paradoxical as it is, have helped towards this result. Some of the greatest leaders of the revival movement in Indian religions, were educated in these colleges. Swami Vivekananda and several of his fellow workers in the Ramakrishna Mission were products of Mission Colleges. We suggest that if a hundred students of each of the three religions be taken at random, there will not be a greater proportion of materialists amongst Hindu and Muslim students than amongst Christians; perhaps, less.

Further, it may interest Dr. Lindsay to know that higher education in Bombay Presidency has for the best part of 60 or 70 years been controlled by Oxford graduates. One of the most eminent of them whose name is still remembered with affection, declared publicly that Western civilisation had escaped the control of Christianity. We put it with all respect to the Master of Balliol College that if he really wants to save Indian students from materialism, he would do well to begin nearer home. India in order to save herself from Western materialism is carrying on a painful struggle against the powerful forces which are arrayed on its side. The assumptions of the Lindsay Commission's Report are not in accord with the views of an increasing number of religious leaders of thought in Europe and America. What they desiderate is co-operative action on an equal footing of all great religions to stem the tide of materialism which threatens to overwhelm all religions. The World Fellowship of Faiths recently held at Chicago was intended to give effect to this desire. The Hocking Commission which followed Dr. Lindsay's Commission, and in fact adopted the title of its Report, "Rethinking Missions," from the latter's Report, urged such collaboration between religions, which, of course, is entirely opposed to the spearhead or sword point policy. We are fully conscious of the great services rendered in the past by Mission Colleges to India. But this was in spite of their avowed object of proselytising. Nor should it be forgotten that two-thirds of the expenditure on these colleges come from fees paid by Hindus and Muslims, and from Government grants, and that only a minute fraction of the students attending them are Christians.

INDIAN MUSLIMS AND SOCIAL REFORM

The papers this week reported the suicide of a Muslim girl in Bombay. Her marriage was to have taken place a month hence. Suicide is rare among Muslims. Suicide by burning herself to death after drenching herself with kerosine oil, is an even more marked departure from Muslim ideology. Such suicides among Hindu girls have frequently occurred, generally owing to the incidence of rigid marriage customs on minds sensitised by social and religious propaganda for three generations. This is perhaps the first case of a Muslim girl adopting this method. The contagion is evidently spreading. Communalist politicians may flatter themselves with the belief that there is a gulf between Muslims and Hindus and that the two communities have fundamental differences in social life. The Age of Consent Report pricked this bubble. It showed that in the important matter of early marriage, Muslims were only some distance behind their Hindu compatriots. It is well known to those whose minds are not obsessed by political exigencies that the life of the general population is moulded on much the same lines socially and economically irrespective of religious beliefs, and that even as regards religious beliefs there is a good deal of overlapping. It can not be otherwise with communities which for centuries have dwelt side by side and have been subject to the same physical and political conditions. So long as public life remained a monopoly of the male sex, it was possible to keep this fundamental unity out of sight. But with the growth of the women's movement in strength and influence the purdah has been irrevocably lifted. Women are the only realists in the true sense, as they are closest to life. The Women's Movement in India has steadfastly refused to recognise communal catchwords for the simple reason that they have no relation to reality as women feel it every day and hour of their lives. Some Muslim leaders made a great fuss about the Sarda Act as being opposed to Islam. But a thousand Muslim women of the best families in the land sent a representation to Government expressing their uncompromising opposition to the attempts to get the law modified so as to exclude Muslims from its operation; and the opposition to the Act collapsed at once. The suicide of the Muslim girl has a significance which the leaders of all communities will do well to recognise betimes. The social ideals of India are the concern not of one community but of all. Muslims so far have held aloof from the social reform movement with a few exceptions. They can not do so any longer. Communal electorates have absolutely no effect as barriers to the interpenetration of social forces. In Turkey and elsewhere, Islam has by itself not been able to maintain its ground against disruptive outside influences. In India, with the great conservative force of Hinduism to sustain it, Islam should be able to make its distinctive contribution to world culture.

WASTEFUL COMMUNALISM.

Some one may usefully undertake an enquiry into the economic wastage involved in the craze to communalise everything. The Reformer has more than once declared that it does not agree with those who would destroy communalism root and branch. There are spheres in which the communal approach is the best and most convenient. These as a rule are the ones in which the special religious doctrines and dogmas of a community largely enter. In all other spheres it is both economical and advantageous to think and act non-communally. The Governor of Bombay gave wholesome advice to the Muslims of the Konkan who, having collected a large sum of money, wished to start a High School with it for children of their community. Lord Brabourne pointed out to them that there was already seven High Schools in the Konkan open to all communities including Muslims and that far more could be done by utilising the money they have to build one or two hostels for pupils of their community, in which special arrangements could be made for giving religious and other instruction suited to their requirements. A generous Muslim donor gave a large sum of money some years ago and stipulated that it should be spent on creating and conducting a Muslim College. After much delay the Islamia College at Andheri was started. It would be interesting to enquire how many of the students attending it are Muslims and what proportion they bear to the total number on the rolls. If non-Muslim students are excluded, the College will be practically deserted, we are told. Not only is the number of Muslim students too small to fill a separate College but the brightest of them prefer to join the other Colleges where they can have the stimulus of intellectual companionship with the best of other communities. Muslim boys are the equals of boys of other communities in every respect. The ablest of them feel greatly handicapped by the badge of inferiority fastened on them by their elders who rely on communalism to maintain themselves in the positions to which they have climbed on it as on a ladder. The new generation when it comes of age will repudiate with contumely the policy to which their fathers cling with pathetic pertinacity. It is for this among other reasons that we deprecate making the abolition of communal electorates the main plank of any political platform. This only gives the artificial vitality which direct opposition almost invariably imparts to fixed ideas.

PRINCIPLES OF BIHAR RECONSTRUCTION.

(BY RAJENDRA PRASAD.)

It is just a month since the great earthquake of 15th January, 1934 violently shook to their depths the foundations not only of our houses, which toppled down pellmell, but also of the whole economic structure of our social organisation, which is bound to have far-reaching consequences. It is not unnatural or surprising that the blow stunned us and paralysed our nerves for the time being. Now that we are gradually recovering our balance and becoming able to understand, in their right proportions, the innumerable effects of this great cataclysm, it is time to consider how best we can help reconstruction of our demolished houses and, no less of the disturbed and distracted economic and social life of Bihar. If we have clarity of vision and strength of will, we may turn even this great calamity into a blessing. We have in a rough sort of way realised the immensity and complex nature of the problem of reconstruction. We should now apply our minds to the principles which should underlie any plan of reconstruction and which should guide the agency engaged in it.

We shall be making the greatest blunder of our lives if we imagine that it is enough to give doles to sufferers to enable them to keep body and soul together and to re-erect their huts and hovels. The best charity is that which inspires and enables the receiver to do without it. Our efforts should therefore, be to evoke and energise those instincts of self-help, self-confidence and self respect which may be paralysed for the time being but which are always capable of revival with proper treatment; and we should avoid like poison every thing which has the least tendency of making people feel that they are helpless and resourceless. In India and particularly, in the devastated tracts there is such an abundance of population and consequently, of available human energy that it should not prove an impossible task to reconstruct Bihar on foundations which may prove safer and sounder than those which have crashed. Only we should not lose sight of fundamentals. Our people are not resourceless in the face of a great calamity, as experience even of this disaster amply proves. Particularly, our village folk are energetic, enterprising and resourceful and, if we can only show them the way, I am confident that they will respond with energy and vigour. If, on the other hand, we committed the unpardonable blunder of lulling them to sleep with opiate doses of indiscriminate charity, we shall be choking in them the noble springs of action, as even our wells have been choked with sand. We have to recreate self-confidence where dismal despair weighs them down. We have to rekindle the fire of enthusiasm where chill despondency freezes the genial currents of the soul. Our Puranas tell us the story of Rishi Kumbhaj who put the whole ocean into the hollow of his hand and drank it up in one draught, of Vishwamitra whose ambition, in which he succeeded was no less than to create a new earth and a new heaven. Our people have lost their houses and their lands, their savings and their goods. But most of those that survived have not lost their arms and their feet, their brains and their moral fibre. They need to use them now as never before and, if once this is realised, the problem of reconstruction, vast and stupendous as it is, becomes easy of solution.

We shall thus be helping them best by not giving them doles of charity which are apt to make them case-loving, reliant and dependent on others and lacking in grit and determination. For example, it is no use feeding people, who are able-bodied and capable of labour, without taking work from them. It is no use erecting houses for those who are able to rebuild them with assistance, guidance and advice. It is equally useless to try to reclaim the devastated land of those who are unwilling to toil for it. Nor is it any use attempting to help those who sit with folded hands, ready to grab what others will have created with the sweat of their brow. Our principle should, therefore, be to help those who are willing to stand on their own feet and not those whose legs can carry them only as far as a relief camp and whose hands can reach only as far as the man that doles out relief. Reduced to concrete terms, it means that doles of food and clothing, should be refused to all except those who, on account of age, sickness or other physical disability, are helpless: that every one should be expected to labour in the work of reconstruction and to labour harder than before, inasmuch as the damage done by Nature has to be repaired by many that the vast human energy, that lies unutilised and is wasted for want of work, should be utilised to its fullest capacity for the reproduction of wealth which has been destroyed; and no quarter should be given to sloth and slipshod easy-going habits. It further means that the people in towns, no less than those in villages, should not be permitted to expect that relief organisations will clear their debris for them, unless they were prepared to take a basket and a shovel in their own hands; rebuild their houses for them, unless they were willing to contribute what they have and, above all, their labour to their rebuilding. Relief Societies cannot afford to become Dharmashala building societies. They may give them building materials at reduced rates, where necessary, or advance them funds on promise of repayment as debts of honour. They may even build houses for those who have lost them, but the occupants should be expected to earn the right to occupy them by their labour, similarly, they may help the more well-to-do with engineering advice and loans to rebuild their houses. Those small traders, merchants and artisans, who have lost their small capitals or tools, may be helped with the wherewithal to restart life, but should be expected to render social service in return. In the country-side where the land is extensively damaged, the cultivator should be helped with scientific advice as to the way of reclaiming it and where reclamation is found to be beyond the physical and moral resources of an individual or family, groups should be formed to pool their resources. Nature has reduced what was but yesterday the most fertile part of this province to the condition of a sandy desert. Those who will labour to reclaim it will create new wealth and those who will not will naturally lose the right even to the sand-heaps.

To carry out this reconstruction requires detailed and well thought out plan and a well-organised and capable agency.

As regards planning, we must make sure that the wrecked towns are not going to be a replica of what they were before, but that they are going to have wider roads, neater and more ventilated houses and healthier surroundings, that they are not going to perpetuate time-old segregation of the so-called lower castes, or recreate the slum conditions of the so-called advanced towns of modern days—in other words, they are going to be rebuilt so as to ensure the physical, social, and moral health of the community.

Similarly, in the country-side the problems of reclamation of land and rehabilitation of the cultivators have to be investigated and a line of action clearly chalked out. Can the land be rendered fit for cultivation by ordinary ploughing, deep ploughing or physical removal and disposal of the sand? Can the sand yield to some chemico mechanical treatment?

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

can the Himalayan streams so be trained and harnessed as to irrigate the sandy tract or yield the motor energy to revitalise the humming life of the plains between the Himalayas and the Ganges? What crops can be grown with or without the help of such energy? If rice is impossible, can we have other crops which can be grown on the sandy land? There are certain crops which serve to blend the sand with the earth and make what is sandy fertile. Can they be used here? If so what are they and how and wherefrom can seeds be got? Will fruit culture prosper? Melons and Kharbuzas are ordinarily grown in sandy lands and Diaras. Where can they be sold, if grown in large quantities? What about ground-nuts? Earth has altered, but not the sun or the season. We may expect rains and also floods. What are the crops that prosper in these conditions? Again, large tracts are under water. Can they be utilised for fish culture? Can they be utilised for culture of plants like Singhara? Can we hope to grow paddy in them? If the land has become uncultivable, can it be made to grow timber and converted into forest? If so, what trees are likely to prosper there?

When the productivity of the land has suddenly disappeared or is greatly reduced, it cannot support the teeming population it has been so long supporting. Subsidiary occupation and industries must be found for the people. What are the cottage industries which can be easily introduced? Spinning and weaving are old, well-established industries in these parts. They may be encouraged. Bee culture may succeed. What else that will suit the temper and the culture of the people?

If, unfortunately, the land is found to be irreclaimable after investigation by experts, among whom must be counted the agriculturists themselves, then the difficult problem of emigration will arise. We have plenty of uncultivated land in Assam and Burma on the East, Sind in the West and Central Provinces in the South. We may go further afield and find such land in foreign countries, if that is necessary and possible.

Another problem that we have to tackle is what is all this to cost? What is going to be the cost of rehabilitation of towns and the countryside respectively under each head? What is the agency which will be necessary to plan and organise reconstruction, likely to cost? Where is it to be found or got from? Next, how is all this to be financed? Are grants from the Government of India forthcoming? If so, to what extent? Are loans going to be raised? If so, of what amount? What is the rate of interest payable to the lender? Are they going to be advanced with or without interest? If the latter at what rate? What about the amounts which will require to be written off? Will the losses accruing on account of the inability of one person to repay be recouped by realising higher rates of interests from others who are able to pay. Again, are loans a safe economic proposition in such circumstances. Will they not burden and clog the economic wheel of the whole province? Are any other devices, like land mortgage banks practicable? What part can co-operative societies play in rebuilding?

I have indicated some of the problems which have to be tackled in any scheme of reconstruction, taking a long view of things and not content with mere tinkering. They are difficult enough, but we cannot afford to be deterred by them. They require engineering skill and agricultural knowledge. They require appreciation of practical economics, as distinguished from mere book knowledge. They require a thorough knowledge of the strength and weakness in the character and culture of our people.

Above all, they require a long vision and a determined will and a band of sacrificing and devoted workers. If the country—and, particularly, this Province—can produce these, the great calamity will prove a blessing in disguise. Let us not delude ourselves that we are going to complete this work of reconstruction in weeks or months or as a matter of leisure-hour employment. It is vast and complicated enough to tax all the energy, enthusiasm and concentration. We can command and exhaust all the funds that the generous instincts of our countrymen and foreigners can furnish.

PANDIT JAWAHARLAL NEHRU'S BIHAR VISIT.

Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, who had gone to Bihar at the request of the Allahabad Earthquake Relief Committee, was unable to write his report of the conditions in the earthquake-stricken areas and on the relief operations there, for submission to the local committee before his arrest. It is learnt, writes the Leader, that on his arrest he left word with the secretary of the committee that, if permitted, he would send his report to Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru, the president of the Bihar Relief Committee, Allahabad, from jail.

Mr. Mohanlal Saxena who had accompanied Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru to Bihar and had stayed behind at Monghyr to help in the organisation of the work of the removal of debris, started by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, arrived at Allahabad recently. He hoped that the debris would be completely removed in less than a fortnight as the work started by the Pandit was in full swing. He gave the following statement to the press.

'I was not prepared for the arrest of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, coming as it did immediately after his return from the earthquake-stricken areas and before he had even the time to write and submit his report to the Allahabad Earthquake Relief Committee at the instance of which he had undertaken the tour. I had accompanied him during this tour and I know what great impetus the relief work has received by his dynamic presence. He was so much moved by the harrowing distress and suffering of the people that he had promised to go back to Bihar again and to stay for sometime specially in Monghyr town and Muzaffarpur district. He had a very strenuous time of it. With a view to having first hand knowledge of the abnormal conditions created by the earthquake in North Bihar and to study the requirements of the situation he had to see things for himself, not by flying in the air but by mixing with the people. He had to travel hundreds of miles daily by rail, motor, boat and sometimes even on foot; taking very little rest in the night and often foregoing his meals in the day. He took exhaustive notes and scores of photographs of the ruins and the other afflicted areas. He held consultations with the relief workers and local men, ascertained their difficulties and gave suggestions for future work. He also addressed meetings at several places and exhorted the people to shake off their present inertia and to be more self-reliant and active. Instead of complaining and waiting for help from others he wanted them to gird up their loins and to begin the work of reconstruction in right earnest, to organise themselves into bands of voluntary workers and to march with pick-axes and shovels in hand from house to house and village to village until every well had been cleared and the dilapidated huts of all those who could not afford to rebuild themselves were made habitable. It is needless to say that Panditji's tour has infused a new spirit among the people and workers alike. Although much has already appeared in the press regarding the devastation and havoc caused by the earthquake still Panditji's report, with his power of keen observation and facile expression, is expected to be a very illuminating document. His suggestions regarding future work will be of great value for the guidance of relief operations."

EAST AND WEST.*

(BY BERTHOLD LAUFER.)

East and West have an entirely different attitude toward religion. All Asiatic nations, excepting those that profess Islam, look upon religion as a means of salvation, as a road possibly leading to salvation—in opposition to the religions of Semitic ancestry, Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, each of which claims to possess the road, the only possible, truthful, infallible, permanent, and unchangeable road to salvation. It is at the surface merely the difference between the definite and the indefinite article, but this difference is profound, vast and far-reaching, and has shaped the trends of history in the East and West in almost opposite directions. The exclusive Semitic attitude toward religion naturally made for intolerance and persecution; the inclusive, broad-minded Far-Eastern attitude resulted in liberality, moderation, and tolerance. The Chinese in particular have been the most tolerant people in matters of religion, and have willingly listened to and extended hospitality to all religions that knocked at their door. No Chinaman has ever launched a campaign for religious persecution or would ever go to war for the triumph of a religious dogma, nor does he long to die for the glory of his country.

He desires to live for it to the greater glory of his ancestors.

China has always had plenty of religion and religions, but religions only; never however, an organized Church or a hierarchy or priesthood that would have meddled with state affairs or interfered with social customs, or the freedom of the individual. One of the wisest institutions of China is that marriage has always been strictly a matter of civil law, the exclusive business of the family without interference on the part of a priesthood. This is the more remarkable when we consider that in all European countries civil marriage is an achievement of recent date and that our ancestors were compelled to struggle for centuries until the separation of the State from the Church was brought about and the Church was assigned to its proper place.

Among us, an individual is definitely labelled like a winebottle, in his peregrination from the cradle to the coffin. We consist of a birth certificate, a baptismal certificate, a vaccination certificate; possibly a marriage certificate, and infallibly a death certificate, or, as a cynic once expressed it, when we are born they pour water on us, when we marry, they throw rice on us, and when we are buried, they throw dirt on us. Moreover, we are definitely labelled in matters of religion: we profess a religion officially and publicly, we may be associated with a certain denomination and be registered by a church to which we belong for a lifetime. Nothing like that exists in the East. The question so frequently addressed to a Chinaman as to whether he is a Confucianist, Buddhist, or Taoist is irrelevant; for, as a matter of fact, he is nothing of the kind or may be everything of the kind. No one in the East makes a showing of religion or professes it urbi et Orbi as we do, and no one is attached to a church, for the simple reason that there is no such institution as a church in our sense of the word. The temples of China, Japan, Tibet, and Mongolia are essentially for the benefit of the monkhood which resides in them.

* From an article in Open Court.

The layman may visit a temple for the purpose of seeking the advice of a priest or consulting the deity by resorting to some means of divination, and he may visit a Buddhist or a Taoist temple on the same day, but there is no community service. Contributions to the maintenance of religious buildings and the clergy are frequently made, but there is no obligation or coercion, and any service is voluntary. The main concern of a Chinese is to obtain long life in this life and salvation in the other life. To him religion is a vehicle carrying him into a better land of bliss, and he welcomes any religion that holds out any promises of salvation and offers the best guaranties. He has never been willing to believe exclusively in one infallible religion that alone might be capable of bringing this result about. Whatever we may think about this attitude toward religion we are compelled to admit that it has made for tolerance toward all religions and for a large measure of personal religious liberty. One of the most curious features of this development then is that the East with its non-ego, anti-individualistic tendency has ended with granting greater personal liberty to the individual, while the West with or despite its theory of the pursuance of individual happiness has finally succeeded in fettering the individual and restricting his movements to a minimum.

In studying other nations outside our own culture sphere and especially oriental nations we awaken to know ourselves and to see our own limitations. We have a great deal to learn from India and the nations of the Far East. We have frequently reproached the Chinese for their lack of patriotism and national spirit and have thereby merely displayed poor judgment and sheer ignorance of the historical factors involved. The ancient Greeks were not nationalists, but merely aimed at being civilised. True they were swallowed by the Roman politically, but their superior civilization conquered the Romans and the entire Roman Empire. Like the ancient Greeks, the Chinese people were never united by the principle of nationalism, but solely by the consciousness of a common bond of a great civilization. In a similar manner the Germans of the eighteenth century were not nationalists: Goethe and Schiller, Lessing, Herder, and Kant were cosmopolitans whose home was the world. German nationalism dates from 1871 with the foundation of the German empire. Nationalism will always run to extremes, and that extreme supernaturalism such as prevails at present is no blessing we have seen from the days of the World War and see more and more from day to day. The present Chinese government in accordance with the teachings of Sun Yat-sen, inculcates and fosters the spirit of nationalism, which is alien to their people and never formed part of their traditional background. Unfortunately they are compelled to adopt it from our "civilization," together with militarism, bombing planes, and other instruments of warfare. In some quarters this may be hailed as "progress." We are confident that this will merely be a transitory stage evolving into a finer and bigger era of true culture in the near future.

Government Servants and their Creditors.

—It is understood that the Government of India propose to introduce in the current session of the legislature a bill to amend sec. 60 of the Civil Procedure Code in relation to attachment of leave allowances of Government servants. What steps are proposed to prevent creditors from securing long-term attachment of salaries of Government employees are not known but this aspect of the matter has also been engaging the attention of the Government of India and a final decision to restrict the rights of creditors in such cases might be reached very shortly.

THE ASHRAM AT PONDICHERRY.

In order to remove many misunderstandings which seem to have grown up about his Ashram in Pondicherry, Sri Aurobindo has issued a statement in explanation of his ideal.

An Ashram means the house or houses of a Teacher or Master of spiritual philosophy in which he receives and lodges those who come to him for the teaching and practice. An Ashram is not an association or a religious body or a monastery—it is only what has been indicated above and nothing more.

The Ashram in Pondicherry came into being in this way. Sri Aurobindo at first lived in Pondicherry with a few inmates in his house; afterwards a few more joined him. Later on after the Mother joined him, in 1920, the number began so much to increase that it was thought necessary to make an arrangement for lodging those who came and houses were bought and rented according to need for the purpose. Arrangements had also to be made for the maintenance, repair, re-building of houses, for the service of food and for decent living and hygiene.

The Ashram is not an association; there is no constituted body, no officials, no common property owned by an association, no governing council or committee, no activity undertaken of a public character.

The Ashram is not a political institution; all association with political activities is renounced by those who live here. All propaganda, religious, political or social, has to be eschewed by the inmates.

The Ashram is not a religious association. Those who are here come from all religions and some are of no religion. There is no creed or set of dogmas, no governing religious body; there are only the teachings of Sri Aurobindo and certain psychological practices of concentration and meditation, etc., for the enlarging of the consciousness, receptivity, to the Truth, Mastery over the desires, the discovery of the Divine Self and consciousness concealed within each human being, a higher evolution of the nature.

The teaching of Sri Aurobindo starts from that of the ancient sages of India that behind the appearances of the universe, there is the Reality of a Being and Consciousness, a Self of all things one and eternal. All beings are united in that One Self and Spirit but divided by a certain separativity of consciousness, an ignorance of their True Self and Reality in the mind, life and body. It is possible by a certain psychological discipline to remove this veil of separative consciousness and become aware of the True Self, the Divinity within us and all.

Sri Aurobindo's teaching states that this One Being and Consciousness is involved here in Matter. Evolution is the method by which it liberates itself; consciousness appears in what seems to be inconscient, and once having appeared is self-impelled to grow higher and higher and at the same time to enlarge and develop towards a greater and greater perfection. Life is the first step of this release of consciousness; mind is the second; but the evolution does not finish with mind, it awaits a release into something greater, a consciousness which is spiritual and supramental. The next step of the evolution must be towards the development of Supermind and Spirit as the dominant power in the conscious being. For only then will the involved Divinity in things release itself entirely and it become possible for life to manifest perfection.

But while the former steps in evolution were taken by Nature without a conscious will in the plant and animal life, in man Nature becomes able to evolve by a conscious will in the instrument. It is not however by the mental will in man that this can be wholly done, for the mind goes only to a certain point and after that can only move in a circle. A conversion has to be made, a turning of the consciousness by which mind has to change in to the higher principle. This method is to be found through the ancient psychological discipline and practice of Yoga. In the past it has been attempted by a drawing away from the world and a disappearance into the height of the Self or Spirit. Sri Aurobindo teaches that a descent of the higher principle is possible which will not merely release the Spiritual Self out of the world, but release it in the world, replace the mind's ignorance or its very limited knowledge by a supramental truth-consciousness which will be a sufficient instrument of the inner Self and make it possible for the human being to find himself dynamically as well as inwardly and grow out of his still animal humanity into a diviner race. The psychological discipline of Yoga can be used to that end by opening all the parts of the being to a conversion or transformation through the descent and working of the higher still concealed supramental principle.

This however cannot be done at once or in a short time or by any rapid or miraculous transformation. Many steps have to be taken by the seeker before the supramental descent is possible. Man lives mostly in his surface mind, life and body but there is an inner being within him with greater possibilities to which he has to awake—for it is only a very restricted influence from it that he receives now and that pushes him to a constant pursuit of a greater beauty, harmony, power and knowledge. The first process of Yoga is therefore to open the ranges of this inner being and to live from there outward, governing his outward life, by an inner light and force. In doing so, he discovers in himself his true soul which is not this outer mixture of mental, vital and physical elements but something of the Reality behind them, a spark from the One Divine Fire. He has to learn to live in his soul and purify and orientate by its drive towards the Truth the rest of the nature. There can follow afterwards an opening upward and descent of a higher principle of the Being. But even then it is not at once the full supramental Light and Force. For there are several ranges of consciousness between the ordinary human mind and the supramental Truth-consciousness. These intervening ranges have to be opened up and their power brought down into the mind, life and body. Only afterwards can the full power of the Truth-consciousness work in the nature. The process of this self-discipline or sadhana is therefore long and difficult, but even a little of it is so much gained because it makes the ultimate release and perfection more possible.

There are many things belonging to older systems that are necessary on the way—an opening of the mind to a greater wideness and to the sense of the Self and the Infinite, and emergence into what has been called the cosmic consciousness, mastery over the desires and passions; an outward asceticism is not essential, but the conquest of desire and attachment and a control over the body and its needs, greeds and instincts is indispensable. There is a combination of the principles of the old systems, the way of knowledge through the mind's discernment between Reality and the appearance, the heart's way of devotion, love and surrender and the way of works turning the will away from motives and self-interest to the Truth and the service of a greater Reality than the ego. For the whole being has to be trained so that it can respond and be transformed when it is possible for that greater Light and Force to work in the nature.

409

In this discipline, the inspiration of the Master, and in the difficult stages his control and his presence are indispensable—for it would be impossible otherwise to go through it without much stumbling and error which would prevent all chance of success. The Master is one who has risen to a higher consciousness and being and he is often regarded as its manifestation or representative. He not only helps by his teaching and still more by his influence and example but by a power to communicate his own experience to others.

TREATMENT OF MINORITIES IN RUSSIA.*

(By SASADHAR SINHA.)

National unity at the expense of the minorities has been attempted again and again. It was tried in Ireland; it has been tried in the case of the Jews in all Western countries; it is being tried in Germany at this very moment, but, in the long run, wherever the minority group is sufficiently large and exists in intimate spatial relation, it has succeeded in keeping itself distinct, ready to leap into resistance at the slightest provocation. It is nationalism in miniature. Like nationalism, the problem of minorities cannot be solved by simply ignoring it. The problem needs more radical solution.

A novel, and by far the boldest, solution of this delicate question comes from Soviet Russia. The Russian solution naturally forms an integral part of Communist philosophy, which in the last resort envisages a world society, but the lessons of this solution are such as to be of universal significance.

Russia, like all vast countries, is a conglomerate of racial, linguistic and religious minorities. In 1926, for instance, it was estimated that Soviet Russia contained 185 racial and 147 linguistic groups. On the other hand, besides Christians of many sects, there live in Russia Muhammadans, Jews and Buddhists. In the pre-War days Russian Imperialism followed the steam-roller method of "Russification," recognized only Russian as the official language and Greek Orthodoxy as the State religion. The Jews and other non-Russians, the Inorodtsi (literally, the foreign born), inhabiting the East, were treated as aliens. They had no civil rights. Thus, although the Russians were in a minority, i. e., 43% of the population, the "official statistics managed to contrive a Russian majority of 68% by counting in the Ukrainians and the White Russians." The Government pursued a steady policy of apotheosizing the Russians over all the other ethnic groups in the Russian Empire. As members of the Imperial race, Russians enjoyed privileges everywhere. In Asiatic Russia, for instance, the indigenous populations were deprived of their best lands in order that the Russian colonists might settle on them. Everything conspired to keep these people economically and culturally backward. Even in European Russia, this policy found its echo. In the zeal for "Russification" the use of Lithuanian, Ukrainian and White Russian languages was forbidden. It was not until after the Russo-Japanese war that books in these languages could be published. Although the claims of the minorities were thus ignored, they were not thereby suppressed.

Indeed, in direct conflict with this centralizing policy, local nationalism had steadily grown throughout the Empire. Among the Western border states, its origin can be traced back to the 19th century, while Pan-Islamism among the Muhammadan populations grew with the resurgence of Muhammadanism in the Near East in the present century. Nationalism among the oppressed minorities and the revolutionary movement among the Russian intelligentsia went on hand in hand, one reinforcing the other. This alliance was not always plain-sailing, because the Russian Revolutionaries themselves were often patriotically-minded. Nevertheless, so long as open conflict was averted, it was a source of strength to both. It is well known that the abortive reforms of 1905 were won by joint effort.

The assumption of power by the Bolsheviks in 1917 immediately brought them face to face with the national question—the question of minority right. The collapse of the Tsarist Empire let loose two forces, which were equally important and equally dangerous. The growth of "Pan-Russian chauvinism," as Lenin called it, among the revolutionary leaders on the one hand, and the growth of separatist movements among the national minorities on the other, boded evil for the future of the revolution. "Pan-Russian chauvinism" thus stood for centralization, breaking down all barriers of race, language and religion, and the creation of a State to all intents and purposes Russian. Behind all this quibbling with words, it was evident that the old imperial ideal was reasserting itself, but only in a different garb this time. The renewed vitality of nationalist sentiments of the racial minorities showed at the same time that the situation called for delicate handling. Slavophilism in any form would set the powder magazine ablaze. Lenin's analysis of the problem or rather problems presented by these two points of view, diametrically opposed and yet not irreconcilable, was characteristic. At the Eighth Congress of the Russian Communist Party (March 19, 1919), Lenin said:

"It seems to me that the Finnish example and that of the Bashkirs show that in the question of nationality it is not possible to proceed from the assumption that economic unity is necessary at any price. Necessary, of course, it is. But we must attain it through propaganda, through agitation, through a voluntary union. The Bashkirs distrust the Russians, because the Russians are at a higher level of civilization and have used their civilization to rob the Bashkirs. Consequently in these remote districts, the name Russian means "oppressor" to the Bashkirs. We must take that into account; we must combat it. We have only now learnt to manage better, and even that only some of us yet. Thus there are Communists among us who say 'uniform schools,' and accordingly no instruction to be given except through the Russian language. In my view a Communist who thinks in this way is a Pan-Russian chauvinist."

The solution followed as a matter of course. The Russian Communist Party firmly laid down the principle of self-determination for all peoples and their complete right to secede from the Soviet Union. This was a solution at once bold and constructive. At one fell swoop it took the wind out of the sails of extravagant local patriotism smarting under Russian oppression, supposed or real.

Obviously, the recognition of formal or constitutional equality between the various racial and linguistic groups (religious or doctrinal differences are not recognized in Soviet Russia) is the beginning, indeed a very minor beginning, towards the effacement of the past which had embittered their mutual relations. The cultural and economic reconstruction of the Union has consequently rivetted the major attention of the Soviet authorities. The main task lay in the levelling up of the cultural and economic life of the constituents of the Soviet Union. With the removal of the economic, often disguised as the cultural, motive, the minorities problem will solve itself.

Cultural work took the form of what in Soviet terminology is called the liquidation of illiteracy and the emancipation of women. Neither of them was easy. Among the non-Russians, in many cases, there did not even exist a written literature. It was a tremendous task. Nothing daunted, the Faithful set to work. National literatures, both literary and scientific, have grown up throughout the Union. Truly national indeed are these, because the key to the Soviet linguistic policy lies, as Dr. Kohn puts it, in "simplicity and popularization." At the beginning of 1931, it is reported, "A reading book for sociology for the first grade schools" was published in the Mari language, a language spoken by one of the Finnish-Ugrian tribes living in the extreme north of Russia, who before the war had no written literature of their own. Even in some of the more advanced areas, scientific studies could not, until lately, be carried on except through the medium of Russian. But so great has been the advance that by this year "there are to be sufficient teachers and sufficient lingual preparation to enable all faculties to use the language of the peoples." The task of women's emancipation, especially among the Muhammadan tribes of Central Asia, was fraught with explosive material. Any unnecessary haste would have spelt disaster. Co-education or free social intercourse among the latter would have been unthinkable in the early days. Special schools and special clubs had to be started for these eastern women. "Red Yurts" and "Red Kibitkas" were instituted in the areas inhabited by nomads and semi-nomads—transportable tents with which teacher and doctor and midwife and library went from camp to camp, held courses of instruction in reading and writing, in hygiene and the care of children, and made the women acquainted with their rights, and tried to organize them." All movements for freedom have their martyrs. Many a heroic Muhammadan woman paid with her life for her faith. Contrary to the usual belief, women had shown themselves more eager for their emancipation than their menfolk. Nevertheless, the civilizing influence has made rapid strides. Since 1927 the old caution on the part of the authorities has been found unnecessary. The "unchanging" East has begun to change. Indeed, in areas on a higher level of culture, like the Crimea, as Dr. Kohn points out, "the veil has completely disappeared. Tartar girls are increasingly attending the State schools....; on the Corso in Simferopol they are hardly distinguishable in appearance and manner from Russian girls."

In the economic sphere a similar policy has been pursued. In the pre-War Russia, the sole aim of the Russian industrial policy was Russia's enrichment. The non-Russian territories within the Empire were treated as virtual colonies. The Soviet authorities have completely reversed the process. A policy of decentralization is being deliberately followed with a view firstly, to bring up the economic level of the undeveloped territories to that of the more advanced, thereby strengthening the economic interdependence of the different parts of the country, and secondly, to create a native proletariat, who would be the backbone of the workers' State. The result of this policy is already reflected in the proportionately larger "tempo" of industrialization in the periphery as compared with the centre of Russia. The exploitation of one part of the country (or of one people) for the benefit of another has ceased. The policy of mechanization of agriculture issues from the same motive. The old antithesis between urban and rural labour, a source of friction and of backwardness in the latter case, must be abolished.

National self-determination, economic and cultural equality among the various units of the Union, however, do not in themselves or even in conjunction ensure a supra-national outlook. Indeed, nationalism often becomes an end in itself, and economic and cultural motives serve to reinforce it. The Soviet authorities themselves are well aware of this danger. The building up of a common culture, the communist culture, thus becomes the cornerstone of Soviet Policy. In other words, this culture will be national in form but common in content. "The Communist state can grant entire lingual autonomy and liberty, but it cannot recognize cultural autonomy and liberty." It is in this sense that Party solidarity assumes such seminal importance. The party organization in consequence takes no cognizance of national differences. It is supra-national in character. It is believed, and from the party point of view, no doubt rightly, that the ultimate defence against all fissiparous tendencies (as the Indian political jargon has it) must be the Communist Party which cuts across all racial and linguistic barriers and unites the party members in a common purpose. "The government and party machinery had to be 'rooted,' to use the official term, in the indigenous population, as the Soviet state could only so be assured of the active co-operation of the broad masses among all its peoples."

Paradoxically enough, the cultural backwardness of Russia has not been an unmitigated evil. The Soviet authorities have a clean slate to write upon. For the bulk of the Soviet citizens at any rate the cultural heritage to which they come is the only culture they have. Everything is new to them. The generation that is growing up today, although speaking different tongues (and even that is not strictly correct today) is imbued with the same cultural outlook. It is reported that since the removal of the Russian language from its privileged position, it is developing by free consent into a lingua franca for the multi-lingual Union. It is bound to be a source of enormous strength to the new Russian society.

RECONSTRUCTION WORK IN NEPAL

General Bahadur Shumshere Jung Rana Bahadur, eldest son of the Maharaja of Nepal, who had been in Delhi on a mission, left for Calcutta en route to Nepal. Among those who saw him off were Colonel Dawkes, Major Sovaj Jung, The Raja of Patan and Captain R. R. Burnett, Under Secretary to the Foreign Department.

Interviewed by the Associated Press regarding the situation in Nepal, General Bahadur Shumshere Jung said that relief measures were progressing rapidly, and the situation was entirely in hand. Galvanised sheets, worth about a lakh of rupees, were ordered with a view to erecting temporary huts. He added that they had to buy non-Indian galvanised sheets as Tatas could not meet the demand immediately.

The general then referred to the plans for future, and said that they would await the monsoon before taking in hand a scheme of permanent reconstruction in his opinion, the damage to Nepal was not so extensive as in Bihar in respect of cultivable land. He mentioned that they had asked the Government of India to grant them a loan and also the help of an expert engineer with a view to surveying the damaged buildings, and advising the Government of Nepal on the new reconstruction programme.

Proceeding General Shumshere Jung expressed regret that the recent earthquake had stood in the way of their carrying out the programme for the development of Nepal, which the Maharajah had in hand. However, one good the earthquake had done was that it had made the younger generation believe in God. The fact that temple after temple stood without slightest damage amidst demolished buildings around could not, he said, but make an appeal to all and enhance their faith in God.

Concluding the General gave an account of death roll in Nepal and said that in the Nepal Valley the figure of deaths was 3,400. Figures for other parts were not yet available. Luckily the ropeway remained unaffected with the result that the supplies of food were not interrupted.

He recalled in this connection that a hundred years ago, Nepal experienced a severe earthquake, when people lived in the open for about a month.

SUFIISM.

Dr. Mohan Singh of the Oriental College, Lahore, delivered his first two University Extension lectures on Punjabi Sufi Poetry on Friday and Saturday last at the Government College Hall, Ludhiana. The lecturer on the first occasion dealt with the Sufi tradition in the Punjab by the 12th Century A. D. He defined Mysticism, named its chief kinds as intellectual, love, Nature and religious and differentiated Sufism from it, which latter he called devotional humanism. Sufism, in his opinion, could be defined as an attempt designed for the faithful to cultivate primarily purity of heart and through it, an attitude of love or passionate adoration for and towards the one, ever present and ever-onlooking God with the help of the Murshid, of God's mercy (Fazl), dancing music, repetition of certain holy names or formulae, contemplation, etc., and generally without the aid of orthodox Muslim ritual, ceremonies and duties, in order that a certain state of ecstasy may be achieved here on earth, interpreting that ecstasy to be the Union of the seeker-lover with the sought-beloved, which union, in essence, was different from the Union of the male and the female only in degree, and not in kind. The intellectual background of the various orders of the Sufis was not very strong nor very clearly defined and pursued to logical ends. Their conceptions about life after death, about the plurality of lives, about the nature of the Union (Visal or Fana), about metempsychosis, about the place of the Holy Prophet varied and in general, as Margoliouth had put it, the chief treatises on Sufism failed to approach the Indian treatises in power of speculation.

The lecturer gave a clear abstract of the prevailing views of the rise of Sufi-ism, its compatibility with Islam and its reactions to Hindu mysticism and concluded that the relation of individual Sufis to Islam varied from more or less entire conformity to a merely nominal profession of belief in Allah and His prophet, that Sufi experience and belief were partly the cause and partly the consequence of speculation concerning the nature of God and man, speculation which drifted far away from Koranic monotheism into pantheistic and monistic philosophies, and that Hazrat Mohammed, on whom be peace, who had in him something of the mystic, felt God both as far and near, both Transcendent and Immanent. On its practical and literary side, Sufism was gratefully indebted to the Bodhisattava Doctrine, to Surat Shabad Yog of the mediaeval Indian Saints and to later Krishnaism. The indebtedness was reflected in the love of the Sufi for the personal beauty and charm of the Holy Prophet; in the Sufi's singing of the love of the seeker for god or for the Prophet or for his guru in terms of the love of the female for the male; in his acceptance of the potency of the mere repetition of the name, of the value of concentration of sight and mind on certain objects, persons, or thought forms, and of the worth of the control of breath; in his insistence on the exaltation and beatification of the Murshid who is placed on a footing of equality with the Prophet and the Lord God Himself; and in his indulgence in vehement declarations of the castelessness, colourlessness, etc., of the Lord and the worthlessness of orthodox religious practices divorced from the love-attitude. As to the utility of Sufi-ism to Islam, in the words of Edward Sell, Thwaytes, Margaret Smith and Edward Holmes, besides providing food for the hunger of the heart and finding for the orthodox a way of reconciliation between his own and the surrounding philosophies in the immediate neighbourhood of Arabia and in the distant Islamic countries, Sufism had proved of great benefit to Islam for purposes of propaganda among the masses of all religions, particularly of Hinduism; further, the appeal of Islam to the scientific, rational mind of today also lay through the love-element in its teaching, or in other words, through Sufism. Again, about the mystic of Islam as about the mystic in other religions, it may be said that while accepting with unquestioning loyalty the teaching of his own church or sect, he finds new depths of meaning in part of its teaching; he dramatizes those parts, makes their dry bones live. Sufis claim to be orthodox and assert that they are the true expounders of the Quran and the Hadis. They maintain that they know, as none other do the esoteric meaning of the words given through or spoken by the Prophet.

NEED FOR CONSOLIDATION OF CHARITIES.

The need for co-operation between the trustees of various Parsi charities and the consolidation of the resources at their disposal was emphasised at the fourteenth annual report of the Parsi Charity Organisation Society, which has been published. The Executive Committee of the Society, which prepared the report, thinks that the lack of such co-operation and consolidation in the distribution of help for educational purposes would tend to the possibility of breeding mendicants amongst the school-going and college-going children.

The report, which reviews the work done by the Society for the year ending June last, states that the total number of applications for help which the Executive Committee was requested to investigate was 2,215. Allowing for duplication, the Committee estimates that it had investigated into 1,900 cases, which shows the increasing burden on the resources of the Parsi community during the last three years owing to unemployment and other cases. The number of cases renewed for help was 867, involving a charity of Rs. 7,800 per month; and fresh cases helped were 334, involving a charity of Rs. 2,540 per month. In sixty-seven cases help was arranged in regard to the payment of arrears of rent, involving Rs. 3,500. The number of cases recommended for casual help was 43, the total help given in this respect being Rs. 2,400.

These figures showed that a fairly large number of families, which at first received casual help, are now becoming normal dependents on charity funds. In two years the total amount of doles, which the charity funds paid to the knowledge of the Society, increased from Rs. 84,000 per year to Rs. 1,25,000. The report states that it is difficult, if not impossible, to estimate the total amount spent by the Parsi community either through charity funds or private sources in the shape of doles for the relief of distress.

The Committee has urged in the past that the resources at the disposal of the community are more real than sufficient for solving the problem of poverty. The only thing that the committee has not been able to bring into operation is a spirit of co-operative endeavour and a proper perspective in the application and distribution of its resources. Those who are responsible for the administration of charity funds, have not yet realised the need for co-operation, for co-ordination of their resources and enunciate a common policy.

Referring to the lower classes of the community, the report adds: "By our system of doles we are creating an organised class of dependents, who manage to live on the margin of subsistence and to breed at a rate which one might call alarming." In the absence of any definite policy, underlying the administration of the charity funds, they only enable the weakling and the unfit to survive and unwittingly contribute to the breeding of an increasing number of the same classes.

The first and urgent need, therefore, the report states, is co-operation between the trustees of charities and consolidation of their resources, if not their concentration. The results of this lack of co-operation cannot be better illustrated than in the working of the system of educational help followed by charity funds. The attention of the trustees of charities to this matter had been called three years ago, but so far no measures for securing co-operation have been made. The committee feels that unless speedier action was taken in this direction (educational help) they might tend to breed a class of professional mendicants even amongst the school-going and college-going children.

The Secretary of the Parsi Panchayat calls attention to this possibility of breeding mendicants in a circular letter, which he addressed to the charity funds, and the committee hopes that the trustees of the Panchayat funds will rise to the occasion and show the way to the community in regard to the distribution of help for educational purposes.

As regards unemployment in the community, the report states that there are at present 500 to 800 families, consisting of fitters, jobbers, carpenters, etc., which are receiving doles. Either these families have to be helped by charity funds permanently or they must change their mode of living. The committee hopes that when conditions improve a well-thought out insurance scheme will be introduced.

ISLAM IN TURKEY.

"Stick fast to your faith and love your fatherland." This was the exhortation of Ghazi Mustafa Kemal Pasha to his fellow-countrymen on the occasion of the last Ramzan I'd, writes a correspondent to the Bombay Chronicle.

Reports appearing in Turkish and Arabic papers go to show that the I'd was celebrated with the usual pomp, both in Istamboul and Angora.

In Angora, Mustafa Kemal Pasha, President of the Turkish Republic and high official of the State attended 'Id prayers held in the Juma Mosque. After the prayers sermons were delivered in which great emphasis was laid on the present-day needs of the Turkish people.

Kemal Pasha in his speech exhorted the audience to stick fast to their religion and to love their country. "To love one's country is part of a Muslim's faith" declared the Ghazi Pasha. "Remember always that you are Turks, and this land of your forefathers belongs to you," he added.

Earlier in the month of Ramzan, usual ceremonies marked the celebrations. Practices, which have been observed for centuries were kept up. The Red Crescent Society (Anjuman-i-Hilale Ahmer) had made extensive arrangements for feeding the poor after sunset.

Salutes of guns from the forts in important cities carried the happy news to the people that the new moon was sighted. On the I'd day printed cards with I'd greetings to the people, on behalf of the Government, were showered from aeroplanes and thousands of Muslims attired in their holiday dresses attended the I'd prayers.

The fact that Mustafa Kemal and his colleagues attended the prayers constitutes a convincing contradiction of allegations that the President of the Turkish Republic and his colleagues had forsaken their religion.

EDUCATION IN TRAVANCORE.

The following are extracts from the review of the Government of Travancore of the administration report of the Department of Education for 1108 M. E.:-

The number of students attending Colleges in Travancore affiliated to the Madras University was 2,915 at the end of 1108 against 2,935 at the end of 1107. The question of introducing the Geography course in the College of Science was deferred for consideration in the light of the proposal of the Education Committee. Provision was made in the Zoology and Chemistry sections of the Science College, Trivandrum, for the admission of a limited number of post graduate students working for research degrees.

There was no change in the number of departmental English Schools for Boys and Girls during the year under review but the number of private schools increased by five, so that the total number of English Schools during 1108 was 27 and the number of pupils under instruction 51,151, against 262 institutions and 53,397 in 1107. There was thus a fall of 2,246 pupils studying in English Schools. The withdrawal of the failed candidates in Form VI owing to the introduction in the previous year of the Revised Syllabus for the E. S. L. C. Examination was largely responsible for the fall.

The total number of Vernacular Schools both departmental and private, at the end of 1108 was 3,476 which is 43 more than the number at the end of 1107 M. E. and the total number of pupils under instruction in Vernacular Schools in 1108 was 5,68,704 against 5,43,329 in 1107 or an increase of 25,375 pupils.

The number of girls under instruction in 1108 was 2,46,693 against 2,35,934 in 1107, showing an increase of 10,759. Of these, 1,63,719 girls were attending institutions for boys; in other words about 66 per cent of the girls under instruction were attending institutions for boys. The number of girls under instruction in Colleges increased from 265 in 1107 to 338 in 1108.

The total number of recognised institutions in the State during 1106 was 3,810 and the number of students under instruction 6,23,665. There was an increase of 49 recognised institutions and 23,542 students, over the figures of 1107.

The total expenditure of the Education department amounted to Rs. 45,54,692 and the total receipts to Rs. 9,29,777 against Rs. 45,14,453 and Rs. 8,32,938 respectively in 1107. The increase of receipts is due to the alterations in the rate of College fees and examination fees introduced in the recent retrenchment and the increase in expenditure is mainly due to the Education Reforms Committee.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

An Effective Protest:—An interesting finale to a marriage drama of an old man was witnessed at Dharwar. It is stated that an old man of the Banja community verging on 60, now resident at Nagpur, had settled his betrothal with the 16 years old daughter of a resident of Dharwar. The date for the nuptials had been fixed. The girl strongly resented the proposed marriage but her protest went in vain. On the day of marriage the old man arrived from Nagpur and at the appointed hour the ceremonies began. At the marriage pandal, the girl mustered sufficient courage to disavow her marriage with the rickety old man, who protesting, was slapped on the face by her in the presence of a large gathering. Excitement ran high and the marriage broke off.

A British Soldier's Humanity:—A successful blood transfusion test was carried out in the Civil Hospital at Allahabad on a patient, named S. S. Srivastava, an Engineer. Mr. Srivastava, met with a serious accident in Naij Sager Works which necessitated the amputation of his leg. Private Hughes of Prince of Wales Volunteers unhesitatingly gave one pint of blood from his body. It is understood twenty soldiers from the same regiment cheerfully volunteered but Hughes was picked upon the ground of blood suitability. The patient was on the point of death due to loss of blood but is now making good progress. Dr. Mishra of the Civil Hospital carried out blood transfusion. The action is all the more noteworthy as European soldiers offered blood for the life of an Indian. Hughes refused to accept Rs. 25 which were offered to him.

Sir T. B. Sapru Denies Message to Aga Khan:—Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru has issued the following statement. My attention has been drawn to certain statements in the press to the effect that I have sent a message to H. H. the Aga Khan regarding the Communal Award. I desire to contradict that statement categorically. I have never sent any kind of message to His Highness or to anyone else on the subject. I can only assume that this report might be due to the fact that, at the request of a friend, I gave him a formal letter of introduction of two or three lines to the Aga Khan as he wanted to have talk with His Highness. I have made no kind of suggestion to His Highness in my individual capacity or purporting to act for any body or community. I have scrupulously kept aloof from all discussions of the communal issue, at any rate for nearly two years and have no desire to take part in such a discussion in the existing circumstances.

Government Servants' Conduct Rules:—An important change defining what is meant by Government servants taking part in politics and elections has been gazetted today amending the Government servants' conduct rules substituting the following for the subrule (1) of rule 23:—(1) Subject to the provisions of rule 22 and of any general or special order of the local Government no servant shall take part in, subscribe in aid of or assist in any way any political movement in India or relating to Indian affairs. Explanation.—The expression 'political movement' includes any movement or activities tending directly or indirectly to excite disaffection against or to embarrass the Government as by law established or to promote the feeling of hatred or enmity between the different classes of his Majesty's subjects or to disturb the public peace. (2) No Government servant shall permit any person dependent on him for maintenance or under his care or control to take part in or in any way assist any movement or activity which is or tends directly or indirectly to be subversive of Government as by law established in India. Explanation.—Government servant shall be deemed to have permitted a person to take part in or assist a movement or activity within the meaning of the clause (2) if he has not taken every precaution and done everything in his power to prevent such person so acting or if and when he knows or has reason to suspect that such person is so acting he does not at once inform the local Government or the officer to whom he is subordinate.

NOTES

Mr. Sastry on the White Paper:—The Servant of India prints as a supplement the full text of the lectures on the White Paper Constitution which the Right Honorable Srinivasa Sastry delivered in Madras. Some remarks about salvation under the British flag which had been imputed to him in a telegraphic summary had given rise to a little misapprehension but the perusal of the lectures completely dispels it. Mr. Sastry in these lectures did not go much into the proposals of the White Paper. He viewed the subject as it has developed and is likely to develop under the influence of the several personalities associated with the enquiry by the Joint Parliamentary Committee. The study of history and a fairly long period of observation, show that personality unless it is rooted in a principle, is merely a fly on the wheel of affairs. The vicissitudes in the attitude of the Prime Minister, for instance, have been far greater in British than in Indian politics. Lord Irwin is now Lord Halifax and he is a member of the British Cabinet, and it is a recognised convention of British politics that a statesman in office is not accountable for what he might have said when out of office or when he was holding a different office. In India we do not understand these conventions although even here instances are not unknown of men when they become Ministers or Members of Government changing their opinions along with their headgear. Inconsistency is as essential as compromise and is inseparable from compromise which our respected friend and correspondent, Mrs. Pitt, regards as the mainstay of British politics which differentiates it from their Ally across the Channel. Why should we bother our heads about what the Salisbury's, the Lawley's and the Samuel Hoare's think or say about what Indians are fit for? They are bound primarily to look at all questions from the point of view of their effect on British interests; and Indian leaders would do well to do the same for Indian interests instead of posing as disinterested advisers of the seasoned British statesmen in the art of satisfying India without diverging the least little bit from their determined line of action. If the protracted and not altogether painless proceedings of the last three or four years, does not teach Indians the ancient truth that only to those who ask is it given and only to those who knock is the door opened, nothing will. It is not the fault of British statesmen that they regard the interests of their own country as their primary concern. The question whether India should work out her destiny within or without the British environment is about as irrelevant as whether Indian reformers should work in and through their Hindu or Muslim heritage. The problems to be solved will remain, whether one calls oneself Krishna or Abdulla or Peter or Pallonji.

The Returned Prodigal:—A considerable circle of friends who regretted the lapse of Mr. M. A. Jinnah into communal politics, which they felt could only be temporary (so totally alien to it are his temper and training), are glad that he is likely to resume his rightful place as a vibrant force in Indian nationalism. The only possible explanation of his having ever fancied himself as a communal leader, is that, like many other generous spirits, he might have hoped to sterilise and ultimately evaporate communalism in politics by going a little way with it. But communalism is not to be cajoled into extinction in that way. People who have adopted it with a view to alchemise it have found that they themselves have been alchemised by it. It is to the credit of Mr. Jinnah, and his friends expected it of him, that he realised before it was too late the danger of being communalised, and did not prevent considerations, which would have daunted less virile personalities, from retracing his steps before it was too late. That the communal politicians accepted him as a leader with mental reservations, is clear from the fact that when he was dropped out of the delegation to the Round Table Conference, his colleagues accepted the situation with surprising complacency and went about their business as if nothing has happened. The fourteen points remained but their author or inventor was as good as forgotten. This, however, is now ancient history.

Two years' observation, and reflection as an on-looker in London of constitution-making has impressed him with a sense of his duty to guide public opinion as to the course it should adopt with reference to the White Paper scheme. Without a more detailed account of his views than the scrappy reports in the daily papers afford, it is not possible to appraise his exact position. But we gather that he is no longer the same convinced advocate of what Sir Henry Lawrence has aptly described as "Balkanising British India", as when he drafted his famous points. That is what we understand by his conclusion that the new scheme, by eliminating the influence which the three Indian members of the Government of India are now entitled to exercise over the whole field—whether they do it, is another matter—from the important spheres which are to be entrusted to the Governor-General but really to a ghost in the shape of an Adviser planted by his side, would be a retrogression from the present one.

Earthquake Relief:—The Viceroy's Fund roughly amounts to twenty-five lakhs and Babu Rajendra Prasad has collected about fifteen lakhs. Another couple of lakhs must have been raised through the various agencies collecting funds for earthquake relief. Most of the money has been raised in India. A few thousands have come from Indians abroad. Little help has come to the stricken areas from foreign countries and by now the relief organisers have realised the futility of appealing to the other nations for assistance. Even Britain who in the time of her need received £ 100,000,000 from India, has scarcely managed to collect £ 1,000 for the London Mayor's fund. Of course one must not forget that Britain has enough troubles of her own without considering her responsibilities to India. Nationally too the Englishman does not respond as generously to distress appeals as the Indian. The Searchlight of Patna comments severely but justly on the difference between the sympathy shown to Japan during 1928 and the indifference displayed by foreign countries to India today and draws the moral that India's political dependence is the underlying cause. That cannot explain the attitude of Britain which has a special duty to India, as a Conservative member of Parliament now in India remarked. It has been made clear that India must depend solely on her own resources for meeting the unexpected calamity that has befallen her. These resources are limited and the other provinces have had to curtail some of their expenditure to rehabilitate Bihar. There has been some talk of seizing the opportunity to improve Bihar and build it as a model city. We are sure that the organizers of relief operations will be careful to avoid the danger of establishing a standard far above the resources of the Indian. Babu Rajendra Prasad himself in the appeal published in last week's issue of this paper, warned the public against that danger both when he remarked that emotional sympathy was almost valueless and when he wrote that assistance should be rendered only in a supplementary form.

Germany and Europe.—Reuter in cabling messages on the European situation has somehow missed a link. We were informed last week that Herr Habicht, "German Nazi Inspector for Austria", gave an ultimatum to the Austrian Chancellor to come to terms with the Austrian Nazis by the end of the month. This brought down on Germany a severe reprimand from the Giornale d'Italia, the semi-official organ of the Italian Fascist Government, which objected gravely to German intercession in Austria. The protest is understandable as arising from Italy's desire to maintain the balance of power in Europe. What seems strange is that the Pope should have followed up the Italian warning with a denunciation of the Hitler regime in Germany. The Vatican is a State which has hardly any political significance and whatever changes may occur in European politics it is very unlikely that they will affect its position. It is therefore curious that the Pope should have singled out Germany for condemnation. There have been cases of racial discrimination in the past which could not have escaped the attention of His Holiness. The persistent attempts to expatriate South African born Indians is a case in point. His Holiness, however, has not apparently felt called upon to express his opinion on the subject till now. We do not think that the anomaly is due to the Pope's being, like the League of Nations, concerned politically mainly with European affairs because in his receptions to the Indian delegations during the Roman Catholic Holy Year he has evinced the keenest interest in India.

India and the Population Question:—The discussion at the recent meeting of the East India Association reveals the conflicting ideals that are present in dealing with the control of population. Sir John Megaw who initiated the discussion favoured birth control methods, so far as one can gather from the summary cabled out by Reuter. Sir Leonard Rogers, however, took the view that the real benefactor is he who makes two ears of corn grow where one grew before and recommended increased agricultural productivity for relieving the stress of population. The Chairman, Sir George Newman, threw his weight on the side of modernity and declared that systematic treatment would solve the problem. He cited the case of England which had increased her population by thirty-three millions but was still the healthiest nation in the world. Sir George is mistaken in separating England from the rest of the Empire in such a comparison.

Islam In The Modern World:—We publish this week a speech by Professor Henry E. Allen of Lafayette College on "Islam and Modern Social Economic Problems" delivered at the Chicago University at a group meeting of representatives of various religions. Mr Allen approaches his ART IN INDIA.

There has been for some years past in Bombay a Three Arts Circle. The Universal Arts Circle was inaugurated last week with an address by Mrs. Sarojini Naidu. The President of this new Circle is Countess Vera de Crasse, who is not very well known in India. The Countess, according to the report in the Free Press Journal, said that the Circle felt that materialism was at the bottom of suspicion and hatred and war, and that the new Association revolted against this cult and stood for the things of the spirit and encouraged self-expression. Materialism is not the creed of India and there is far less need of a revolt against it in this country than in the West. A protest against Materialism as a creed or cult is nowhere more an act of supererogation than here. The philosophy, the culture and the social institutions of India are an emphatic repudiation of Materialism. As for "things of the spirit", these are apparently not the same to the Circle as what India has understood them for centuries to be. This is clear from the third and last object of the Circle, "to encourage self-expression". For the consistent teaching of Indian philosophy through the ages has been that not "self-expression" but "self-effacement" is the way to the "things of the spirit". Unless we understand self-effacement to be the supreme form of self-expression—mother love is the outstanding instance—the things of the spirit which are to be attained by self-expression are obviously not those which can be attained only by self-effacement. The West to which religion has meant Pauline Christianity, looking about for something to take its place, has hit upon Art as a complete substitute for religion. Art has been raised to a cult of which the central idea is "self-expression." In the West this cult has consciously set itself to encourage the expression of self indiscriminately in all its moods.

Criticising the tendencies of the present day Indian Art, says the Bombay Chronicle, Mrs. Sarojini Naidu observed "the intellectual domination of the West is the most tragic wrong that India has sustained." The report goes on to say that the reason why she did not want the Western form of art was that, whatever its form and nature, Indian art must be authentic and not an imitation. "The first concern of Indians, therefore, must be to liberate themselves from this intellectual bondage." Happily this danger which was very real not long ago is no longer acute. The reformers of India, among whom an honourable place belongs to Annie Besant, have by patient and persevering efforts relieved the intellectual relations between India and the West of the character of subservience on one side and domination on the other which it possessed not long ago. Simultaneously the West also has moved forward from its attitude of superstitious self-complacency. We have evidences of this double process in almost all spheres—Religion, Philosophy, Art. The political movement in India has become profoundly significant to the West just because it is the natural development of spiritual movements which preceded and are behind it. If the Universal Arts Circle is in line with the Indian renaissance movement, it may be a useful auxiliary. Frankly, however, we are suspicious of the encouragement of self-expression as an object of propaganda. Self-expression in its highest form is indistinguishable from self-effacement. But it is also capable of lower forms and in the lowest it is identical with bestiality. Tennyson warned his generation of the danger "lest divine philosophy push beyond her mark and be procuress of the lords of hell". The warning applies to Art even more. The tendency in some circles in the West, literary as well as artistic, is to regard the beast in man as of equal status as the God in him. "Art for Art's sake" is the most hackneyed of its catchwords. The anarchy in modern thought is the result of each branch of science setting up its own separate standard. Economics is a conspicuous and disastrous example. A branch of Ethics, it has thrown over its lawful allegiance and become the greatest disturber of international and interclass relations. India has been infected by this economic poison.

In his remarkable book "A Defence of Conservatism" Anthony Ludovici argues that the Jewish influence in England has tended to destroy all values except the only one which is within its reach, namely, the purchaseable. "This means," he writes, "that the Jew's form of power—wealth—will find itself opposed to all other kinds of power, such as Gentile aristocratic lineage, Gentile aristocratic character and prestige, hereditary honours of all kinds, and, above all, national solidarity (by this I mean loyalty between the various classes) which are all things that cannot be bought, which have no market price and which the Jew can not get possession of, no matter how rich he is." This, whether it is true of Jewish influence in England or not, has been, helped by political power, the tendency of Western influence in India. Mrs. Sarojini Naidu's protest is not, therefore, an impulse of national vanity. It is a protest against the destruction of the soul of India. The evil has advanced far into the national life. Old social bonds have been weakened. The man whom the West adores is the successful "business man." His gospel of "nothing for nothing" has become its gospel. If one leads a blind beggar across the street, one expects to be rewarded for it if not by a medal at least by the publication of one's photograph with a laudatory notice in the next day's paper. Not infrequently he himself sends both to the Editor. If the Art of India cannot be saved from a similar fate, we might as well have no Art at all. The Gita proclaimed work without an eye to reward as the highest religion. It is also the highest Art. For Art, in the words of the poet of Art is

The love of loving, rage

Of knowing, seeing, feeling the absolute truth of things

For Truth's sake, whole and sole, not any god, Truth brings

The knower, seer, feeler,—beside.

This also is the goal of philosophy. There is one other point. The supreme quality of Art is simplicity, spontaneity, frugality of means to ends. Western influence on Indian Art encourages none of these. The dominance of that influence inevitably leads to meretriciousness not only in Art but in every sphere. Life is a whole. Art which is not true to Life is merely artisanship.

INFLUX OF FOREIGN DOCTORS.

The Bombay Medical Association and the Bombay branch of the British Medical Association have decided to request Government to prevent or restrict the immigration of foreign doctors into India. This decision, says the Times of India, follows the arrival in Bombay during the last few weeks of between 30 and 40 doctors mostly Germans, who have been debarred from practising in their own country, because they are Jews. One of these doctors when interviewed argued that if India allowed the entry of foreign capital and foreign capitalists and found their entry to her advantage, there was no reason why she should not find the immigration of qualified foreign doctors to her advantage. It seems a pity, he added, that India should forget her traditions of hospitality and seek to turn out people who could really be useful to her. Dr. K. K. Dadaachanji's article in the Bombay Chronicle headed the "Menace to Indian Doctors" did not put the case against the influx of foreign doctors in the most convincing form. Its main plea was that the advent of the foreign doctors was likely to throw out of employment a large number of qualified Indian medical men. This, no doubt, is a consideration but, from the point of view of the general public, it is easily outweighed by the fact that there is a distinct shortage of medical practitioners and that the greater part of the country is without medical aid. The medical profession exists primarily to render help to the people and not to provide incomes for doctors. Even more appealing to our mind is the immemorial Indian tradition of hospitality to strangers who sought asylum. The ancient Jewish colonies and the flourishing Parsi community attest to the wise toleration of Indian rulers in vivid contrast to the exclusive intolerance of contemporary States. This tradition is one which we should cherish as the most precious part of our heritage.

But there are other considerations which can not be left out of account. The foreign doctors are most unlikely to supply the want in the villages of medical assistance. They have a higher standard of life than the generality of Indian doctors who do not find rural practice sufficiently remunerative to induce them to settle down to it. More important still is the fact that the foreign doctors know nothing of the habits of the people, their social customs, their religious scruples, their dietary, their reactions to drugs suited to the meat-eating races of Europe. In many cases, the doses which are needed to correct the deficiencies of the alcoholised European constitution, are too strong for the Indian constitution attuned to hereditary abstinence. Before the foreign doctor learns to appreciate these factors,—the psychology of the patient which is becoming recognised as the essential part of medicine, is another important factor—he will probably kill more patients than he cures. The problem of affording medical aid to the population will not be really solved by the influx of foreign doctors any more than our industrial problem by the import of foreign goods and merchants. Then, as regards our national tradition of receiving refugees, how does it apply to the present case? If the doctors came as refugees and sought asylum, we for one should feel bound to oppose their exclusion. According to the traditional practice, they would be allowed to settle in a suitable part of the country to practice their religion and to live their accustomed lives without interference and without interfering with the social and economic life of other communities. But this is not the case with these doctors. They can flourish here only by depriving Indian practitioners of their legitimate spheres of usefulness. There is also the fact that, unlike the ancient communities which sought and found asylum in India, the modern Jews have Palestine assigned to them as a national home. We do not think that the British Government would be pleased to have the Palestine situation reproduced on a larger scale in this country.

BEWARE OF DRUGS.

A drastic pure food and drugs Act has been long overdue in America. Now that an Act on this line is going to be passed there, many shocking irregularities in the food and drug preparations are being revealed in the American Press.

(Concluded from page 418)

subject with sympathy and in fact reveals in his address that he looks to Islam to remedy some of the glaring defects of modern society. Mr Allen was one of the two Americans chosen to speak for Islam at the discussion, nearly all the other faiths being represented by men who had been brought up in them. Mr Allen's responsibility was, therefore, a heavy one. The address which we print this week from the Journal of Religion, is a valuable analysis of the reactions of Islam to modernism.

LORD BRABOURNE AND THE WHITE PAPER.

There has been some questioning in Parliament regarding the propriety of the Governor of Bombay's invitation to the members of the Bombay Legislative Council to come forward openly in support of the White Paper Scheme. In his first speech to the Council His Excellency expressed his belief that the members were all supporters of the constitutional method of securing progress. He went on to say: "I hope, therefore, that I can count upon your support of the policy at present adopted in the matter of constitutional progress in India." It does not follow, because the members are supporters of constitutional methods, that they are supporters of the White Paper proposals. Lord Brabourne did not stop here. To leave no doubt as to his meaning, he proceeded to say: "I believe that this Council is at heart in favour of what is described as the White Paper. I do not mean that it is entirely satisfied with all the details but that it accepts its general principles. If that is so, I would urge you gentlemen, to come out in definite and open support of this policy to avoid the idea that by expressing condemnation of the policy as a whole you can secure the desired modifications in detail. To adopt such tactics is merely to put weapons into the hands of the convinced opponents of the policy of His Majesty's Government, and can not but be fraught with danger to the progress of the Reforms, which we all hope to be introduced at an early date. I appeal to you, therefore, gentlemen, as the elected representatives of the people of Bombay to take the long and statesmanlike view of this question, and to come out openly in support of the constitutional method of progress and the proposed White Paper Policy which I am sure is the one best calculated to ensure that progress shall be on sound lines."

Of the disinterestedness and sincerity of this exhortation, there can be no two opinions, as Lord Brabourne thereby has staked his Indian career at its very threshold. The National Cabinet whose policy is embodied in the White Paper shows many signs which portended the fall of the Lloyd-George-Bonar Law coalition. Punch which is a good reader of the pulse of British opinion, showed which way the wind blows by its cartoon depicting the Prime Minister as a circus rider standing on two restive horses. The by-elections, even though most of them returned Ministerial supporters, showed much reduced majorities for them. In his own constituency Mr. Ramsay MacDonald met with a much-mixed reception. His refusal to receive a deputation of hunger strikers led by two members of Parliament, is a fresh proof of his waning confidence in himself which the Times noted not long ago. The Conservatives are becoming restive; in a recent division the Government majority in the House of Commons was the lowest recorded the bulk of the Liberals who supported the National government have crossed over to the opposition. It seems inevitable that Mr. MacDonald will soon be swept out of office by the combined force of discontent among all parties. His disappearance from the Ministry would, it is understood, involve a general election which is as likely as not to return a majority of Conservatives who are dissatisfied with Mr. Baldwin's prosaic personality and pedestrian leadership. Whether Mr. Winston Churchill becomes the Prime Minister or not, the next Conservative Cabinet will not hold itself bound to adhere to the White Paper. Lord Brabourne after his personal canvassing for the support of its policy by the Legislative Council cannot but find his position as the head of the Government of Bombay untenable. It will be a pity because he and Lady Brabourne during the short time they have been here have produced an excellent impression by their unassuming ways and their eagerness to identify themselves with the social and cultural life of the country.

Apart from the personal aspect, we are afraid that His Excellency is not quite accurately informed of the public feeling as regards the White Paper. If by its general principles, he merely meant the principles of Federation and temporary safeguards he was certainly right in thinking that Indian opinion supports them. But there are details which Indian opinion considers equally important. As the White Paper contains not only the two principles but a multitude of such details, which Sir Samuel Hoare's evidence before the Joint Parliamentary Committee has in some important respects tended to aggravate, acceptance of the White Paper will be surely interpreted as acceptance of the whole—principle and details. Nor is the present Bombay Legislative Council competent to accept the scheme. The two solid blocks in it are the official one and the Sindhis. The former must vote with Government. The latter will disappear when the reforms are introduced and its vote, therefore, will be given solely on the detail relating to the separation of Sind about which it has been very keen. The Council itself is, at the end of the term for which it was elected.

EAST OF SUEZ.

To those who earnestly believe that the character of the British people is fundamentally opposed to the extremes of Fascism or Communism two short items in Monday's daily papers must have come as a severe shock. I am surprised that so far no one has apparently seen the connection between the two. The first of these is the advice given by Lord Baden-Powell to one Mr. Wilson before sending him out to India to strengthen the Scout movement, that 'some of these natives are not possessed of the same ideas and minds as White men; they have no ideas of chivalry themselves and are full of conceit and self-importance, and if this is allowed to grow without check they are apt to become insolent and mutinous which is a dangerous thing in countries like India and Africa where millions of natives are ruled by a handful of whites. It is necessary, therefore, to remind them now and then to respect the British rulers.' I am not aware whether Lord Baden-Powell is a member of the small group of British Fascists led by Sir Oswald Mosley. His anxiety to maintain British prestige, however, may well entitle him to a prominent place there. Even after making due allowance for the fact that the venerable leader of the Boy Scout Movement is reported to be seriously ill and that the recent animated discussions in Britain on the White Paper scheme must have further added to his confused view of the Indian situation, this pronouncement stands out clearly amidst the ambiguous statements of British leaders. Nor can one avoid expressing admiration for Mr. Wilson for communicating these presumably confidential remarks to the press on the eve of his visit to India with the object of affiliating the numerous Scout organisations which have hitherto avoided affiliation, with Lord Baden-Powell's central organization. It is possible either that Mr. Wilson does not view the mission entrusted to him by Lord Baden-Powell seriously or has so much confidence in his personality that he believes his mere presence in India will be sufficient to achieve the object, whatever the feelings of organisers in India.

The other incident which has attracted somewhat more notice, is reported to have occurred at Colombo where the M. C. C. were playing a match against an Indo-Ceylon team. Describing the incident the Ceylon Observer stated, "Clark was batting at the pavillion and when he was joined by Marriot in the last wicket, Clark walked out of his crease a couple of yards and was noticed using the spike of the toe end of his boot in breaking up the pitch in a line with the leg stump. W. S. Flindall, one of the umpires, who noticed Clark's extraordinary action went up to him and said, 'What are you doing?' or words to that effect. Clark's only reply was to use the pointed end of the bottom of his bat to make a further depression on the ground. On the remonstrance of the umpire Clark walked back to his crease." The Observer proceeds to explain that the captain of the M. C. C. team as well as Marriot apologized to the captain of the opposing team for the action. The first point that struck me in reading the report was that Clark had come in for a deal of criticism merely for carrying into the field of support the tactics of modern political life. His action in "breaking up" the pitch, presumably with the immediate aim of assuring his side of victory at a crucial stage of the game and the ultimate one of maintaining British prestige, is not without a family resemblance to the safeguards in the White Paper scheme for guaranteeing British interests in India. And the daring with which he acted when his side was in a precarious position, regardless of spectators, umpires and the rest, carries its own lesson to Indians. Despite the lamentations of pessimists, the age of chivalry is not dead. If history is to be believed this is exactly the stuff that empire-builders are made of. The remarks of the umpire, the captain of the rival team and of the captain and another member of the M. C. C. team place beyond doubt the truth of the adage that success falls to the adventurous. In the face of so thrilling an incident on the cricket pitch the conclusion of the Observer, that "there is bound to be a report of it by the authorities when the team returns to England", is mere anti-climax. Clark after all probably only meant to "remind" the Indo-Ceylon team that he as a member of the ruling race was not bound by any rule of the game in playing with the Indians.

The attention of the public has been drawn to yet another incident, this time in Bombay, by one Mr. Kesharwala who in a letter to the Bombay Chronicle of last Saturday complained that he and a friend were insulted at the H. O. H. fete by a European gentleman who apparently was in charge of the Palais de Danse. The two Indians were dressed in the traditional dhoti and they were asked by the European to occupy back seats on that account. Further, the waiters were, it said, instructed not to take orders from the Indian gentlemen. Personally speaking, I was surprised to read this as two items were widely advertised on that day's programme which should have repelled many Indians from attending. One of them was a burlesque of the cancan and the other was a performance of the cancan itself—the cancan, as the Oxford Dictionary explains for the benefit of the uninitiated, is "an indecent dance". It is probable, however, that the European gentleman who is reported to have deterred the two Indians from attending really felt that only the English or the Anglicised Indian could witness these performances without detriment to their morals. The best thing that the two friends could have done, having inadvertently stepped into this Palais de Danse, was to have left the place even had it involved their losing the price of the two tickets. The incident, however, serves to show the difficulties with which attempts to bring together the Indian and European section of the population in this country, are faced. The European only too often feels that the honour of his entire race is in his keeping.

It would be rash to conclude from these incidents that the Fascist Party as such is likely to have an easy victory in England. Evidence of the opposition that the party has met with is furnished by a demand of the Oxford University Labour Club for complete racial equality and by the police action taken recently in England against certain Fascist members for administering a corrective dose of castor oil to an erring fellow Fascist. Fascism, however, thrives on opposition and even though the party may remain a negligible minority in political life, signs are not lacking to show that its ideals are having an appeal to individual members of all the three major political organisations. That Mr. MacDonald who has hitherto distinguished himself by his sweet reasonableness and passion for compromise, should refuse to meet a delegation of hunger-marchers in England on the ground that their communist purpose is "common knowledge," is not without significance. That Lord Lymington, a Conservative M. P. who recently resigned his seat in the Commons on the ground that the real work lay outside it, should reveal in various press interviews that he knows how to keep "the backward people of India in law, order and peace," and will visit this country evidently with a view to confirming the knowledge he has already acquired, is also auspicious to British Fascism. It is amusing to note that whilst British parties are slowly assimilating the principle of racial superiority, the leader of Italian Fascism should have expressed his realisation of the importance of inter-continental amity and understanding. But it is becoming increasingly true today that not only has Europe ceased to look to Great Britain for political leadership but Britain herself has assumed the role of camp-follower to European statesmanship.

MATRICULATION AND FARMING.

The Editor,

Indian Social Reformer,

Sir,

I suggest that parents should be recommended to give their boys a year or so in the country. Contrary to what happens in the case of boys in Western Countries, our boys (and even grown up persons in the cities) are woefully ignorant of fields and flowers and the other beauties of nature and also of the commonest handicrafts.

A boy in India is put to school generally at the age of seven or eight, some times even less. The parents' only concern is to see that their boy daily attends to his lessons at home and regularly attends school. The pressure exercised by the parents increases as each examination approaches nearer.

The burden on the school boy increases with each promotion to a higher standard. Less and less time is left for daily exercise. In addition to school hours, coaches are engaged to secure a pass. The number of books to be read grows. Even the vacations are not respected. Scarcely any attention is paid to the question whether the young shoulders are, in all cases, fitted to bear the ever growing burden.

Having once put the boy to school, there is no break. If he enters school at one end, he must go on year after year, until he comes out, a Matriculate at the other.

If the boy immediately after matriculating, (as is usual), enters upon a college course, the grind begins again, to be continued without interruption for a period of four years more.

Immediately on coming out of College the youth's thoughts are centred upon earning a livelihood, where the struggle for existence is keenest and wherein he will require to devote all his energies in future.

Thus it is clear that an Indian youth does not get real respite, from the age of six until he attains the age of twenty, when he has to enter on life's battle.

The time just after a boy has matriculated and before he joins College, offers, a convenient interval, when, without serious scholastic loss, he can devote himself to build up his body in nature's surroundings and handiwork. The heavens cannot fall, if the entry into College is delayed for, say, a year. On the contrary, College professors should find it a more pleasant task to lecture to healthy boys, who understand something of life in the fields and the beauties of nature.

If those engaged in agriculture, are consulted, it will be found that arrangement can be made with farmers in villages to house and to teach farm work etc., to the boys for stated periods.

THE RIDDLE OF UNEMPLOYMENT.

THE EDITOR,
The Indian Social Reformer,

SIR,

The discussions and articles we read now in papers on the subject of unemployment put one in mind of certain annals of an ancient monastery that were quoted in a prospectus issued some years ago by Ruskin Hall, Oxford. The quotation is as follows:-

"It came to pass at that time that there arose a grievous quarrel among the brethren as to the number of teeth in the mouth of a horse. Great tomes were brought from dusty shelves. Such ponderous erudition was displayed as never could have been supposed to exist in those parts. For days this disputation raged without ceasing. On the fourth day, a young neophyte craved humbly for permission to speak. My fathers, said he, not in open tomes but in the open mouth of a horse, will you find the true answer to your questions. Grant me then permission, I will so seek it for you there. Thereupon, a mighty clamour arose. Surely they said "The devil has promoted this bold neophyte to ways of seeking knowledge unknown to the fathers." Then driving him forth they smote him hip and thigh. After a while, the disputation came to an end. The number of teeth in the mouth of a horse was writ down to be a mystery for the lack of clear and sufficient information in the writings of the fathers thereon. The dove of peace then sat again on the community but the neophyte was no longer among them."

We may laugh at the ancient monks but in what do they differ from our modern governments? There are many bold neophytes now telling them to look and see how much the world produces and by how many ways, we might bring its abundance to those who are in need. But they will heed only ancient doctrines suitable to past ages about the currency and other systems needed to distribute wealth. Inevitably, however all thoughtful people are waking up to the realisation of the fact that the neophytes are right and the wise and learned are blinding themselves.

The Mayor of Karachi is now become sufficiently commonsensical to inaugurate an experiment on the lines indicated by a boldly conceived bill recently placed before the United States Senate to solve this Master Problem of our time.

COMPROMISE.

The Editor,

Indian Social Reformer,

Sir,

"Listening in" to a broadcast account of the recent Paris riots given by an eye-witness, the narrator was heard to remark: "We Britons may look on and congratulate ourselves that we can now carry through our revolutions without riots or bloodshed, I suppose because we are accustomed to compromise."

This set me thinking how much this word "compromise" comes to the fore nowadays, and I venture to suggest that the fact of its importance is being forgotten in political India at present. Is it realised that compromise (which Mr. Baldwin said means sacrifice) is not only an essential of a Democratic system, but is the machinery which, in modern times works every conference, Disarmament, Economic, etc.?

Those politicians who see in the White Paper proposals nothing but their grave defects, and reject them on that account, appear, in this connection, to be entirely missing the point; and to the onlooker their hostile attitude gives rise to the sad reflection that the imputation which has been sometimes cast upon them, and which they naturally repudiate, that they lack "political sense", is nevertheless justified.

"They cannot see the wood for the trees."

THE WORLD FELLOWSHIP OF FAITHS.

The World Fellowship of Faiths (second Parliament of Religions), has fulfilled its promise by bringing together 188 eminent leaders of all faiths, races and countries who delivered 232 addresses during the Chicago World's Fair, June to November 1933.

The Executive Committee decided to extend the period of the World Fellowship of Faiths to June 1, 1934 and to hold additional sessions with a culminating convention in World Goodwill Week, May 12 to 18, in the Grand Ballroom of the Hotel New Yorker in New York City.

Several distinguished foreign and American speakers who promised to participate in the Chicago sessions and could not because of illness or pressing duties, will be invited to take part in the supplementary sessions in New York.

The purpose of the World Fellowship of Faiths is; "To Unite the Inspiration of ALL FAITHS Upon the Solution of Man's PRESENT PROBLEMS." Among the vital problems to be especially emphasized in our New York City meetings in May are "Racial and Religious Prejudices—How to Overcome Them?" "How Prevent War?" "Spiritual Recovery Necessary for World Recovery."

Several sessions were held in New York City. Among them were one on October 31, 1933, at the Grand Ballroom of the Hotel New Yorker when Pandit Shri Shridhara Nehru, L. C. S., Director of the Indian Rural Uplift and President of the Indian Science College for Agriculture, delivered an address on "Shall The Withered Tree Come Back to Verdure?" Madame Raj Dulari Nehru spoke on "Hindu Women in World Progress."

President Balkrishna, Principal of the Rajaram College in India, formerly Principal and Governor of the Aryan Residential University of Hardwar, delivered three addresses; on October 31, 1933 at the Hotel New Yorker on "Hindu Theories of Cosmic Evolution"; on November 5, 1933 at St. Marks-in-the-Bowwerie on "India's Contribution to Civilization"; and on January 1, 1934 at the Church of the Truth on "The Cultural Contact between India and America."

His Highness the Maharaja Gackwar of Baroda has become the International President of a new International Committee of the World Fellowship of Faiths which is to sponsor a second International Convention in London or in India in 1935 or 1936.

Bishop Francis J. McConnell is National Chairman; Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, Dr. S. Parker Cadman, Mr. Patric Henry Callahan and Prof. E. R. A. Seligman are the National Vice-Chairman; Mr. Kedarnath Das Gupta and Mr. Charles Frederick Weller are the General Executives of the World Fellowship of Faiths which has its headquarters in New York City at the Hotel New Yorker and in Chicago, Illinois, at the Hotel Morrison.

UDAY SHANKAR IN AMERICA.

Under the auspices of the Union of East and West a reception in honour of the world-famous Hindu dancer, Uday Shankar and his talented company of artists, was held on Sunday afternoon, January 21, 1934 at the North Ballroom of the Hotel New Yorker, New York City, one of the largest hotels in the world. The beautiful hall was packed to the capacity with American ladies and gentlemen and Hindu residents of New York.

Mr. Kedarnath Das Gupta, Director of the Union of East and West, presiding, said: "The purpose of our organization is to bring the noblest and best of the East to the West, and vice versa, with a view to promote a better understanding between the East and the West. Uday Shankar is the best interpreter of the art of dancing of India. We are proud to present him to you today."

Miss Mila Wellerson who is considered to be the world's greatest woman cellist, played a few numbers to entertain the distinguished guests.

Mrs. Mary Hanford Ford, one of the leaders of the Baha'i Movement in New York and the oldest member of The Union of East and West, presented the following address to Uday Shankar and his company:—

"We, the Members of the Union of East and West, greet you and honour you today in recognizing the significance of your contribution to the arts of dance and music, and through these arts to the truer understanding between the East and the West, which is the aim of our organization. In a day when the bewildered spirit of humanity is seeking new roads to unity, it is a joy to know that your delicate and gracious art has found a sympathetic reception in the hearts of our most representative scholars, artists and students. The great artist bridges the gulf between the East and the West. You have used your art to bring us grace and beauty and to enkindle faith in the reality of spiritual truth. We respond with sincere appreciation and gratitude; we express the hope that you will always remember that here in America you have friends who will nurture the seeds you have left behind and from which will spring up new leaves for the realization of Peace and Brotherhood. We wish you, under God's Providence health, happiness, ever-increasing success and long life to continue your sweet-scented labour."

Uday Shankar said: "I do not know how to thank you for this reception. Without being modest I can tell you that what I have brought out to America is nothing in comparison with what we still have in India. My dream has been fulfilled by the collaboration of able musicians and my family people, but your encouragement has proved the way to my bringing better things. I thank you all once more for the kind way in which you have received the arts of India."

Rajendra Shankar, B. Sc., a member of Shankar's company, said: "The Fellowship of Faiths has been doing a great deal in bringing about an understanding between the East and the West. But in the true sense of the word there is no East and West outside conventional and arbitrary divisions. Nevertheless, books have been written by spiteful tourists and visitors in their frenzied attempts to calumniate one another. Let us look to the evidence of good and beauty everywhere instead of finding faults and enrich and beautify ourselves therefrom. Proper understanding and harmony will break down the barriers of the East and the West till we shall all mingle into one, with the closer bond of Oneness. Let us all hope and strive for that day."

Pandit Dr. Shyama Shankar, barrister-at-law, father of Uday Shankar, said: "My relation with the Union of East and West dates back to 1912. It was then I met Mr. Das Gupta at Mrs. Brown Potter's house at Staines, in England. He was a pioneer in the field of bringing the East and the West together and had just staged 'Buddha' by way of presenting dramatic arts to the British public. Nothing gladdens the heart of a father more than to see his own son honoured, especially in a City like this and I thank you all, ladies and gentlemen, for the kind reception you are according to him today. I shouldn't let slip this opportunity to mention that the pioneers in the field of introducing Indian histrionic arts in the West, like Mr. Das Gupta, deserve your full admiration."

With this introduction Dr. Shankar made a speech on "The Spiritual Background of Indian Music and Dancing." In conclusion he said: "What is the real end of art and how can they unite the East and the West? I hold that the real end of arts is Dharma which again means the progressive evolution of the soul. A real artist cannot fail to proceed in the field of spiritual progress. His path is one among the many. An artist with a penetrative faculty must sink deeper into the very essence of the objects or characters he seeks to depict. He gradually arrives at the very soul of nature and ultimately to the soul of all souls, the spirit of all things and beings. What remains then of the East and the West, North and South? The farther and farther we travel away from the ultimate souls of all beings the more we develop differences. The farther and farther we travel back from these surface developments, the nearer and nearer we approach the fundamental unity of all souls—the unity of all individuals, communities, races and nations. There is a real end of artistic progress."

IN DEFENCE OF PEACE.

(BY BERTRAM PICKARD.)

At a moment when there is much dangerous talk of war, both east and west; and when the League of Nations is menaced, not only by the withdrawal of certain governments, but by hostile criticism in many countries not excepting Great Britain, it is appropriate that the organised peace forces of the world should rally to consolidate that 'collective system' of preserving and constructing the peace of nations of which the League Covenant, the Statute of the World Court and the Pact of Paris are the outstanding symbols.

The meetings of the International Federation of League of Nations Societies, to be held in Brussels this week, have provided the opportunity for such a demonstration of public opinion. Thus, during the days of February 15 to February 17 inclusive, will be held, under the Federation's auspices, an International Congress in Defence of Peace in which many national and international organisations will participate.

The Congress, naturally enough, will not only aim to consolidate the League of Nations in a general way, but will strive to bring pressure to bear upon governments with a view to securing concrete and positive results at the Disarmament Conference without which it is obvious the dangers of international anarchy would be overwhelming.

Lord Cecil has taken the personal responsibility of submitting to the delegates a 'Declaration of Policy' as basis for discussion in the Congress.

The Congress will conclude with a mass meeting in which many distinguished speakers will take part including Viscount Cecil, Monsieur Vandervelde, the well-known Belgian Socialist and one-time Foreign Minister, Don Salvador de Madariaga, the brilliant Spanish thinker and diplomat, Monsieur Politis of Greece, and Monsieur Rene Cassin, the eloquent Ex-Service Men's leader of France.

A GREAT INTERNATIONALIST.

The sudden death of Monsieur William Martin former International Editor of the Journal de Geneve in the prime of life, is an irreparable loss to the League of Nations, and a personal grief to the wide and influential circle of people who looked to him, not only as a unique journalist and publicist, but as an indomitable fighter for peace and true seer of internationalism.

It is just a year ago since "W. M." laid down his pen in Geneva, after long months of constant strain due to his dauntless struggle day after day to rally opinion to a League solution of the Sino-Japanese conflict. Since then William Martin has himself been to China returning just in time to preside over a great Disarmament Demonstration of international opinion held in Geneva on Sunday, October 15 last.

His death at the present juncture is a tragic loss to the Peace Movement; but his example will live on as an inspiring memory to a host of his admirers.

ISLAM AND MODERN SOCIAL ECONOMIC PROBLEMS.

(BY HENRY E. ALLEN.)

I should much prefer to limit the subject of my paper to Turkey, because when one faces the prospect of embracing the whole Moslem world he finds that he has something much more on his hands than one unified country such as Turkey manifests at the present time.

However, before we discuss the social and economic problems which today confront the Moslem world, it might be well just to refresh our minds for a moment regarding the chief characteristics of the Islamic social system, and then, with this as a background, we may be better able to understand and evaluate the significance of some of the current trends.

Of Moslem society in an unspoiled state, whether it be in savage Africa or sophisticated India, one can say that it is extraordinarily God-conscious, that it is permeated, as are few other social systems, by a religious control which extends into every area of conduct. For the bona fide Moslem community laws are not made by congressmen, M. P.'s, or commissaires whose authority is granted by their fellow-citizens; the great law of Shari'at of Islam rests upon sacred foundation, the Holy Koran, which is regarded as God's ultimate revelation to His people. Never is the Moslem permitted to forget his religion and his God. Allah is everywhere, and one must pray to him five times daily—and without the intervention of a priest. There is one day a week upon which special prayers are offered, but this does not cause the Moslem to shower his adulations on God that one day, Friday, and forget Him the rest of the week. In every town or city are beautiful mosques with graceful minarets pointing skyward high above the marts of commerce, constant reminders of the simplicity, majesty, and beauty of religion. To the mosque trudges the child to obtain the only education he is likely to receive—the study and repetition of God's holy word. For her ailing babe the worried mother hastens to the marabout to secure his prescription, a scribbled text from the Koran, to restore her child to health. And for the settlement of disputes and litigation the Moslem has recourse to the Kadi, a judge trained in holy writ and its commentaries.

Moslem society, which has these features constantly to remind it of God and religion, exhibits certain other distinctive characteristics which are traceable more or less directly to religious sources. Take, for example, the high estimation accorded the warrior, resulting from the belief that one who dies in combat with infidels will immediately attain paradise. Consider the contempt with which Moslems regard bankers and business men whose fortunes are acquired not through work or service but through usury in disobedience to Mohammed's injunction. In how many Moslem communities have financial and commercial enterprises been disdainfully left in the hands of the subject races—Jews, Greeks, Armenians.

Notice the emphasis placed upon generosity and sharing in Islam. The regular giving of alms, sikat, is one of the five important duties or Pillars of Islam. Great credit is his who donates generously to philanthropic enterprises or who gives freedom to a slave. Few religions can boast of greater proportionate wealth devoted to pious purposes than Islam, with its rich Vahs or Evakas, philanthropic endowments built up through the centuries as a result of innumerable individual gifts and bequests. Not for Moslems the selfish and anti-social accumulations of huge private fortunes. These were prevented not only by obligations of generosity but by laws of inheritance, which granted to widows as well as children important shares in the estates of departed husband.

A word must also be said concerning the high standards of morality and purity stressed by Islam. Moslems have always stood as uncompromising prohibitionists, and among the rigid Ikhwan of Arabia, puritanical tendencies outlaw even tobacco. As for sexual purity, one has only to point out the close seclusion of women within the sanctified enclosures of the harem to appreciate what extreme measures were taken to guard against promiscuity. In order to eliminate the degrading and anti-social practice of prostitution, Islam has preferred to legitimize polygamy, thereby granting to surplus women an opportunity to attain a respected status in society. I might remark here that as a matter of fact polygamy was much less frequent in Islam than people have often supposed. Monogamy was much more frequent because of economic reasons. It costs more to support two wives than it does one, and except in the country, where a wife made an excellent economic help on the farm, to tote the wood or to help with the plough, Moslems tended to be monogamous. Incidentally, the factor of household and domestic tranquility was also important.

Significant, too, in Islam's social order is the absence of caste and colour distinctions. From the time of the Prophet men of every hue have co-operated in the propagation of the faith, and Islam has always insisted that all believers are equal in the sight of God.

Such in general can be said to be the chief characteristics of Moslem society, subject of course, to variations according to local influences. By and large, however, the essential elements have been manifest throughout the world of Islam, a world in which religion has long exerted a commanding influence. Had it not been for two important factors, the Moslem world might still be poised and confident, unconfused by the cataclymic events of the last century, more specially the last twenty-five years. These two factors were, first, fatalism, the development to an extremity of the concept of God's omnipresence and omnipotence, resulting in a fatalistic reliance upon the supernatural for all development, and a resigned acceptance of the status quo presumably the product of God's gift; second, pride, the growth of a false sense of superiority and security, based historically on the conquests and intellectual achievements of Islam, and causing Moslems to ignore or view with disdain the new discoveries and techniques of the despised Western world. Thus having cut itself off from internal and external stimulation, Islam was suddenly knocked into a state approaching dissolution by the terrific onrush of recent world-events.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

It is not our purpose at this time to deal with the factors responsible for this chaos. They were largely bound up in the impact of West upon East. We may now merely point out that Islam was rudely awakened to its inferiority by the events of the World War and succeeding years. It found itself broken up into independent units, each of which had to determine for itself how it should adjust its life to the new era. The old Moslem unity, symbolized by the Caliphate, was lost. If, in adjusting itself to the new age of industry, education, and emancipation, our Western world has become rather dazed, it is no wonder that Islam, with a much shorter time to make adjustments, casts blindly about and occasionally slips into absurdities.

By no means has the response to new conditions been uniform throughout the Moslem world, for that world contains groups in every stage of advancement. But the amazing thing is that no corner of the Moslem world, from Morocco to the Philippines, has escaped a severe wrenching. A possible exception may be noted in Arabia, where, in distant Yemen, the Imam Yahya seems to have maintained his old customs in the face of modernization. And Afghanistan, after Amanullah's premature attempt to introduce new customs into his very backward kingdom, seems to have returned to medievalism, while her scattered cities and mountain fastnesses serve as places of refuge for bigoted Moslems of other countries who cannot tolerate the changes experienced in their own lands. In some instances the changes appear to be minor and superficial; in other cases, as in Turkey, they are sweeping, but usually it is the same process: a removal of religious control from one social area after another, and a gradual restriction of the domain of religion to a narrow sphere, that of the individual conscience. In Turkey the change has apparently gone the limit; the old institutions of Islam are cut off from existing social influence and are attempting to keep alive with a status comparable to the Church in the West. One cannot predict with any certainty that other Moslem countries will follow Turkey's lead in this regard for it is conceivable that the religious forces in other parts of Islam will have time to come up to date and will not be shoved suspiciously aside as enemies of progress. One may note in this connection the new modernization of the University of Cairo, that great traditional centre of Moslem learning, and the growth of the new University in India, particularly the university of Aligarh, and such movements as the Association of Moslem Young Men, or, as it is called Y. M. M. A., the Young Men's Moslem Association, which give indications, that in Islam, outside of Turkey, there are forces stirring which are seeking to come to date. Certainly one thing seems predictable, and that is that any religious feature inherited from the past will not be allowed to stand if it interferes with the attainment of human satisfaction and the complete life.

Examples of Islam's social upheaval and its loosening of religious controls are so numerous that selection of illustrations is difficult. Let us take first the fate of the holy law, or Shariat, which has always been the foundation of Moslem jurisprudence. What changes it is undergoing as independent states draw up their constitutions along modern lines and as externally controlled regions find themselves ruled by people with totally different legal concepts! Egypt, for a number of years, has been attempting to patch up and modernized her antiquated legal system. Turkey, under the Committee of Union and Progress, tried many years to bring her Medjelleh up to date but under the Ankara government gave up once and for all the attempt to renovate it. It is well known how, in 1924, she abandoned it completely and replaced it by modern codes from Switzerland, Italy, and Germany.

In contrast to the notion that laws are based on God's revelations, the Turkish Law or Fundamental Organization, No. 83, Article 1, states that "The Government belongs unconditionally and without restriction to the nation. The system of administration is based on the fact that the people govern strictly and effectively, in fact and in person, their destinies." In the dozen or more Soviet Republics where the population is predominantly Moslem one can easily guess what has happened to the holy law under Moscow's guidance. The Soviet Republics and Turkey have also not hesitated to appropriate for state and social purposes the ready treasures of the Vaks or pious foundations.

Education is no longer an affair of the mosque except in remote and untouched regions. Throughout the Islamic world one notes a compelling eagerness for education, especially for the new learning from the West. Since the religiously trained kadjis are unable and unwilling to impart such knowledge, the political governments in the several countries are establishing secular school systems. The teachers in these schools are much more likely to derive their inspiration from Paris, Berlin, London, or Moscow than they are from Mecca. It is an interesting thing that in Turkey the experiment is even being tried of co-education, which is, of course, revolutionary for the Moslem world.

Unprecedented activity is to be noted in the fields of health and sanitation. The old fatalistic attitude which accepted disease as the will of Allah, is giving way before determined attacks of health societies and physicians versed in the medical science of the West. Marabouts and shrines of healing are being gradually supplanted by clinics and hospitals. Turkey has even used some of her religious leaders to write sermons for delivery in mosques during the holy month of Ramadan, pointing out that Moslems should defend themselves against tiny animals like microbes just as they defend themselves against dogs or wild beasts.

Another severe blow to the prestige of religious prescriptions is to be found in the growing interest of Moslems in the commercial and financial methods of the West. Instead of leaving these long-despised matters to Christians and Jews, Moslems are themselves learning how to carry on banking and trade. No longer are they deterred by piety from lending money at interest. Mastery of European business methods seems to offer them a challenge. I will never forget the eagerness with which an Arab hotel-keeper in Beirut sought to outdo his foreign rivals with a hostelry which he regarded as thoroughly up to date. In order to escape competition from non-Moslems who are more experienced, an independent country like Turkey, which can get away with it, has passed laws making it virtually impossible for non-Turks to do business in the country. Financial pre-occupation has reached such a stage that adoption of the Sunday holiday in conformity with European practice is even contemplated, so that the Moslems may not have to lose their Friday as a day of trading on the stock exchange!

Industrialization is not yet a severe problem so far as I can tell in the Islamic world. There are few countries of Islam which have gone in much for large-scale machine production. It is all too new to them, but before many years they will unquestionably be at it. Much more interested are they at the present time in scientific agriculture. Many are the experimental farms which are being set up in an attempt to bring better results from their crops.

Another interesting development in the modern time is the decrease of nomadism. This, of course, was started centuries ago. The civilized city and town dwellers and farmers have gradually been pushing back the nomads, but now it seems to be going faster than ever. It is interesting to notice how, in Persia, where the oil wells are developing, many nomads are for the first time finding settled occupations attending the wells and doing various other jobs which they find there.

As if the growing prestige of the business man were not bad enough, there are many indications that the career of the warrior offers far less attraction and prestige than formerly. Young Moslems do not show any enthusiasm for military service, and one can imagine many an intrepid hero of the past turning in his grave as he hears modern apologists, particularly from India, describing the inherent pacifism and tolerance of Islam, declaring that in Islam alone may one find the true practice of the spirit of Love!

In the realm of family life and the place of woman, dramatic changes are occurring. Every one is familiar with the rapid disappearance of veils and the new freedom accorded to women in various Moslem countries. While this has happened in cities where people are in touch with modern happenings, it will be many years before the status of the conservatives women in outlying districts will have perceptibly changed. Perhaps as the Moslem woman becomes better acquainted with her sisters of the West, with their penchant for vulgarity and exhibitionism, there will be less enthusiasm for complete abandonment of privacy and maidenly modesty. And it is not easy to see bars and cabarets penetrating the Moslem world and apply the world "progress."

When I spoke of the adoption of the new Swiss civil code in Turkey, that of course brought with it legalization of monogamy, because that was the Swiss law, and therefore it came into Turkey. Turkey, therefore, is the first country in Islam which has outlawed polygamy. Those Moslem lands which have been most exposed to Western influences have been rather precipitate in their abandonment of traditional ways in their rush to become Europeanized. Much of the old undoubtedly had to go, but it is to be hoped that henceforth modifications are made wisely. In its hungry rush to sate itself with those viands which make up the pottage of modernity, Islam must take care not to barter away its birthright. The followers of Mohammed, with their fine traditions of chivalry and reserve, their high esteem of virtue and morality, and their acceptance of religion as a meaningful element in society, must not abandon these treasures, tarnished though they now appear, without a clear realization of what they are giving up. Certainly Islam has something to share with humanity in its lack of racial prejudice and its ideal of generous, individual sharing for social welfare.

In an era where the extremes of individualism and communism are striving for mastery, perhaps the Islamic order, with its sense of private ownership tempered by individual responsibility for community welfare may merit more careful attention than it has yet received, and may provide a harmonization of the opposing principles taught in Wall Street and the Kremlin.

INDIANS IN JOHANNESBURG.*

(BY HILDA BEEMER.)

There is no part of Johannesburg inhabited solely by Indians. In the slum areas everyone, Native, Coloured, Indian or poor White is forced to fraternise through the sheer force of physical propinquity. In a yard, Doornfontein, there are three Indian families scattered among Natives. Though these Indian families are not next door to each other, the distance between them cannot be judged by the fact that here are perhaps eight or more intervening "houses" and it is rarely more than a hundred feet. They consist of one room which serves as bedroom, kitchen, living room, pantry and bathroom as required. The size varies from 9' x 8' to 6' x 5' and the rent from £ 1 10s. to £ 1. Legally the landlord may not charge more than 15/- per month, but he keeps within the letter of the law by exacting the additional money but giving a receipt for 15/-.

The rooms are of iron or tin and have a gap for a window which is usually covered with wood or sacks on account of the "dangerous locality." Drains are unknown and there is no chimney; even if one thought of being clean it would be almost impossible under these conditions.

The furniture usually consists of one dilapidated bed, a dressing table, a kitchen dresser, a few stools and a gully stove or primus. There is never anything like a carpet except in cases where the floor is sunk when a few bits of sacking and cloth are strewn on the ground. The ceiling very often leaks and is patched up with cloth.

The number of inhabitants of the room naturally varies. In one there were two grown ups and seven children. Those who could wedged themselves on the bed with their parents, the others slept on the floor. Cats and kittens are part of the slum and drop in anywhere at all hours. Children of the neighbourhood ran in and out and friends are always found in the rooms.

Every race has a national dish, but few races live almost entirely on this and nothing else. Indian curry constitutes the major portion of the diet of all Indians. It is very satisfying, rich and heavy, though unhealthy. The main reason why it may be considered unhealthy is that it is eaten at night almost immediately before retiring to sleep.

Most Indian children have something to eat three times a day, but naturally this depends upon the position of the parents.

Breakfast is never an elaborate meal among Indians. Among the majority it consists of the remains of the previous night's meal; rice if left over is reheated or made into rice cakes and there is tea or coffee, bread or butter. Among the poorer Indians there is rarely anything over from the night before and children often go to school after having eaten nothing but dry bread.

Lunch is another "scrap" meal specially among those Indians who are working and children seldom get a hot meal when they return from school. One little girl whom we saw late in the afternoon had

* We reprint the above extract from Miss Beemer's report to the Johannesburg Ind-European Joint Council from Indian Opinion. Miss Beemer is on the staff of the South African Institute of Race Relations.

nothing but two slices of dry bread and a cup of tea since the previous night.

Dinner is the big meal of the day. All the family are present and it is, in every case interviewed by us, preceded by some form of grace. The most important and substantial dish is the world famed curry into which everything is mixed—potatoes, chillies, carrots, cabbages, and other vegetables, ghee, and lumps of fat. Vegetables form an integral part of the diet of the Indians as they are an essential for the curry. The most usual are those which are least expensive at the time, but potatoes and tomatoes are always used. Vegetables are not eaten raw, but are always cooked.

Milk is bought by all Indians even those living in the slums.

Meat is chosen according to whether or not it will make a good stew and mutton is popular.

Fruit does not play an important role in the diet of Indian children. They like fruit but it is expensive.

Health agencies are totally inadequate for Indian children. There is no nurse visiting the poorer quarters.

The Indian Government School has its own clinic where children are treated free of charge.

When a child living at Rooiyard was taken ill, her mother had to take her to Mission clinic and stayed at home to nurse her. The mother in this case was the sole breadwinner, the father was out of work and had been so for three years, and there were two other children. All the time that the child was ill the entire family stayed, ate and slept in the same room.

The overcrowding is terribly unhealthy. The window is closed all night, there is no ventilation in the poorer houses, in winter it is icy cold, in summer fiendishly hot. It is amazing that there is no more disease because, under such conditions one infectious case would infect a whole quarter. The sanitary conditions are appalling. At Rooiyard there is the garbage heap right at the entrance, but there is almost as much rubbish strewn in the narrow alley which runs between two rows of slum rooms. This alley serves innumerable purposes; in it the children play, and if they have fruit throw away the peels, the mothers burn their gully stoves there and sit inhaling the foul smoke, wet washing is hung on a line strung across the alley, etc. There is no bathroom and but one tap, with the inevitable result that baths are taken once a week in some cases, twice a week in others, and as the water is cold they have not much effect.

Practically every child is sent to school between the ages of six and eight. Practically every class in the schools is overcrowded and the staff is insufficient. Hitherto, as there were no facilities for Higher Education, children left school after Standard VI.

Indian parents of the higher classes are anxious that their children should receive good education and Mrs. H has left two of her daughters in India in order that they might receive a better education than is given to Indian children in Johannesburg.

The attendance of children is not regular, more particularly if their parents are poor. One boy of eleven whose father sells bags and bottles, is absent from school twice a week when he goes with his father and helps. A little girl of eleven (who looked very delicate) must stay at home once a week to do the cooking and washing and general house work when her mother is out selling baskets.

These children have no books at home other than school books and no such things as mechanical toys or other playthings which might develop any talent in that direction.

The majority of the children can speak both Indian and English, and very often a Native dialect as well. Not many speak Afrikans. Indian parents very seldom let their daughters go out working, and it is usual for them to get married at an early age.

One of the most regrettable features of all slum life is the absence of any play ground for children. The children are therefore driven to play in the streets. When the Municipality does supply grounds the White population often refuse to allow Non-Europeans to benefit thereby. For example a plot of ground was allocated to the people of Hertrams, and swings, etc., were put up; no mention was made by the Municipality of any "colour bar" but when the Indian children played there, the parents of the white children made so much fuss and unpleasantness that the Indian children went back to the streets.

There are no organised games for the majority, and they have few toys. They are always playing, however, and running around.

Indians seem to go for very few walks, and it is a pity that there is nothing to amuse them in the evening because they go to bed immediately after their evening meal.

It is still fairly simple to differentiate between Indian and other children of Non-European parentage. Though they rarely wear the sari or other essentially Indian clothing, the girls often have exceptionally bright dresses and boys' clothing is rarely as ragged as that of the Native children.

WOMEN AND SOCIAL REFORM.

Under the auspices of the Madras Constituency of the All-India Women's Conference, a public meeting of women was held on Friday February 23rd, at the Queen Mary's College, Mylapore, Madras to report on the work of the eighth session of the All-India Women's Conference recently held at Calcutta.

Lady Krishnamachari (wife of Sir V. T. Krishnamachari, Dewan of Baroda) presided. In her opening remarks she said that conferences like the one recently held in Calcutta were useful to them in deciding the course to be followed to remedy the condition of women in India and in inviting the attention of the legislators and the public to their demands. It was gratifying that in their discussions there had been a great measure of unanimity on most issues. But probably that was because compared with women in advanced countries they had many just causes of complaint. Most of the complaints were such as the men themselves should have remedied without any prompting from women. Whatever might be thought of demands like those of equal rights in property or in respect of divorce, about which women themselves were divided, even the simple reforms necessary for the wellbeing of the country as a whole had been neglected.

Proceeding, Lady Krishnamachari said that at the present moment they had to fight against the forces of reaction which had been raised by the temple-entry agitation. In order to resist entry, those opposed to reform appealed to orthodoxy and to old texts which equally opposed every kind of reform. It must be recognised, however, that people at the present day could not deny themselves the right of altering their conditions of life to suit their age. The work before them was difficult, and every woman who had the interest of the country at heart should do her best to help.

Lady Krishnamachari in conclusion gave the audience an idea of the social legislative enactments now in force in the Baroda State. Long before the Sarda Act was brought into effect in British India, she said, the Baroda State had a law restraining child marriages. In working the Act, the courts freely fined the people and the money was used for social work. The moral influence of such prosecutions had been very great. There was a law against the marriage of old men with young girls. Marriage laws had been simplified by abolishing the Sagotra rule and only retaining prohibition up to three degrees. An Act styled "Sanyas Diksha Restraint Act" forbade the initiation into Sanyas of or giving Diksha to a minor, such initiation being made punishable with imprisonment up to one year and a fine up to Rs. 500. There was again an Act styled "Caste Tyranny Removal Act" by which it was sought to provide that no caste shall excommunicate or otherwise punish a member of the caste for a breach of such "tyrannous customs" as enumerated in the Act.

SPIRIT OF YOUNG JAPAN.

JOHN J. CONSIDINE writes in the Examiner:

I find it easy to call up the memory of my journey with Genkichi Yamaguchi, a Japanese student officer of the aviation corps, that bright August morning aboard the vessel which plies between Amori and Hakodate in northern Japan. I sat on a deck chair admiring the Strait of Tsugara which was beautifully calm and the shore line which, despite a slight haze, was fresh and lovely, while he in his natty uniform sat near. As happens on such occasions the conversation began neither of us could say just how.

And when he left me after our half day together I had a new appreciation of the mighty ardour which glows within the breasts of the youth of Japan.

I had spoken with other Japanese men and young women and learned much, for all were affable and very courteous. But it was this boy from the military school, who in the beginning seemed so cold and reserved, who ended by convincing me of the tremendous thing it is to be a son of Japan, to be a servant of the Mikado, to be a candidate for a career in the forces of the Empire of the Rising Sun.

He was of Tokyo (I found later he was of an excellent family, resident of an exclusive quarter of the capital) and his father was a general.

And he himself? "I shall be an officer."

And this journey? Each summer he went to a different section of his country and this year it was to Hakkaido. "When I shall be an officer I must know well Japan."

Had he been to Europe? No. "When I shall be an officer I shall go."

Did he speak English? No, he had chosen to study French. "When I shall be an officer I shall have need of French."

"When I shall be an officer"—what a world of meaning was bound up in those words! Each time he uttered them, some power within him seemed to take possession of his face and, despite all his efforts to oppose, twist it into a luminous smile, particularly attractive because it appeared to come forth regardless of the boy's most desperate attempts to remain grave. In those words, he could not hide the fact, was the embodiment of all the hopes, the aspirations, the ideals that played through every fibre of his soul. And for the space of the morning he detailed to me his work, the studies he must make during the five years which separated him from his goal, the greatness of his country and the love of country of every young man of Japan, but particularly his own—"For I shall be an officer!"

What a formidable power is this Japan, I decided, that has built within the breast of its youth such temples of devotion to the fatherland.

"And have you ever heard of the Pope and of the Vatican?" I asked. He was at a loss. Evidently he had met the words before but recalled them only vaguely.

"Have you never heard of the great church of the Pope, St. Peter's in Rome?" Ah yes, most certainly! At a cinema recently he had seen the bells of St. Peter's being rung for the first time by electricity. Beyond this however, he could call up nothing regarding the centre of Christendom.

NOTES

Mirza Ali Akbar Khan:—Mr. Justice Mirza Ali Akbar Khan whose sudden death at a comparatively, early age cast a gloom on his colleagues and a very large circle of friends in Bombay, was, before he was raised to the Bench, a centre of cultural and wholesome social influence in the city, particularly among students and others interested in things of the mind and spirit. After he became a Judge, he led a more or less isolated life but he was always at the service of any movement which had for its object the promotion of goodwill and harmony amongst the communities. He was a scholar and his interests were intellectual and varied.

Study of Comparative Religion:—British policy in India has for over half a century been based on the assumption of the existence of a fundamental antagonism between Muslims and Hindus. It is very difficult to convince the average Briton who thinks at all of India that this is not the fact, for the reason, among others, that it affords a plausible explanation of the British domination in India. Unfortunately, however, some Muslims as well as Hindus have also acquiesced in this assumption. Everything that is done to disabuse them of it, is a service to the country. We were pleased to read an excellent article in the Bombay Chronicle of the 2nd March from the pen of a Muslim scholar on the Bhagavad Gita. The writer, Mr. S. M. Rahman of Akola, concluded that the practical teachings of the Gita "make it one of the most wonderful guides of life that humanity has ever known." Incidentally, he touched on the identity of the teaching of the Prophet of Islam with that of the Gita. In the study of the Koran (in Pickthall's classic translation) this is the very thing that impressed us. The differences between the Koran and the Gita are due to the different circumstances in which they were promulgated. In his introductory remarks, Mr. Rahman says: "I do not know of a more efficacious method of cultivating amity, goodwill and catholicism than the study of comparative religion. This wholesome and salutary study broadens your outlook and enables you to realise the striking identity of the fundamental teachings of all religions." This is the conviction of a rapidly increasing number of thinking men all over the world. The World Fellowship of Faiths held in Chicago last year, which is being continued in New York this year at the desire of many prominent scholars in different countries, is a concrete expression of it. The Indian Committee which is planning to have the Fellowship held in India will be glad to have the co-operation of Mr. Rahman.

National and Communal Unity:—The Nawab of Chhatari whom, on the nomination of His Highness the Aga Khan, the Executive Board has unanimously elected to be Chairman of the Muslim Conference, has issued a statement in accepting the position. "From the very inception of my political career," he says, "I have been a firm believer in harmonious relations between communities, and it pains me to see bitterness between the two major communities of this country or any differences of opinion among the members of my own community. Unity among Muslims is the first necessary step towards bringing about a unity between the two communities." This sounds logical but life does not run on syllogistic lines. Indian Muslims will never be able to reach any but a temporary unity for specific objects such as are covered by the fourteen points so long as on national questions they are at variance with the other communities—not merely the so-called majority community—which in order to further their own development will be obliged to count on or create dissensions among Muslims who hold the key position. The causes of the present dissensions among the erstwhile solid group of Muslim leaders are quite obscure but we are certain that one of them is the strong and steady gravitation which the non-Muslim mass is exerting and will always exert on its Muslim neighbours.

The Bombay Legal Aid Society:—The Report of this useful institution for last year shows a steady advance in the extent of its service to the poor who can not afford to pay for legal advice. Legal assistance was given to wives seeking to obtain maintenance from husbands; wives seeking divorce; wage earners seeking to recover wages from employers; those injured by accident on railways and by motor cars; persons convicted of offences, by filing appeals and applying for revision of orders made against them. An insolvent debtor was helped to prosecute his application in insolvency and some persons in obtaining custody of their minor children illegally detained. In three cases persons convicted of murder were acquitted on appeal which was filed by the Society in the High Court. In order to help ignorant victims of accidents who are exploited by unscrupulous intermediaries, the Society has issued notices in English and the vernaculars offering its services and has got them published in the Hospitals. The co-operation of these institutions has been sought. The principal Bombay Hospital, J. J. Hospital, has under instructions from Government declined to assist the Society. This deserves to be looked into. We congratulate the Society on its excellent record. Two lady lawyers have joined the Committee recently and their services will be appreciated by poor women who feel shy in revealing their grievances to males.

The Original of The Bible:—We make no apology for reproducing the rather lengthy but intensely interesting account by Mr. Dan B. Brummitt of his visit to the famous Library in Leningrad to see the Codex Sinaiticus, said to be the oldest extant manuscript of the Bible, which has since been purchased by the British Government for £ 51,00,000. Mr. Brummitt was not able to get his camera in time to take a picture of the precious document. But those who are curious to see what it is like, can find the photograph of a page of it in the last edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica alongside of one of the manuscript in the Vatican Library. Mr. Brummitt does not say from what original the copies were made. In his great poem, "A Death in the Desert", describing the last hours of the disciple beloved of Jesus, Robert Browning who was scholar as well as Poet, refers to a manuscript on parchment of "three skins glued together and stained and conserved with juice of terebinth." He refers also to "the plate of graven lead" from which the Boy Pressing his finger in the deeper dents,

Spoke, as 'twere his mouth proclaiming first,

"I am the Resurrection and the Life."

What has become of these graven plates of the Gospel of St. John?

The Barrows Lectures:—We reprint from the Guardian of Madras an appreciation of the Barrows lectures delivered by Dr. Sheiler Mathews in Madras. These lectures were also delivered substantially in the same form in Bombay and other centres. The pith of the writer's criticism seems to be that Dr. Mathews did not bring out the bearing of his thesis on the problem as it concerns India. Surely, this is the result of a misconception. There is a group of religious scholars, with the University of Chicago as their principal centre, who approach religion as social phenomenon. Dr. Mathews who is one of its leaders, described and illustrated the methods of this group; and he asked Indian scholars to apply those methods to Indian religions. It was obviously not his intention to undertake this task himself. It would have taken several months for him to have even cursorily attempted to do so even if he had made the necessary study of our religions. The point of view which he expounded is new to Indian thinkers and alien to their tradition.

The Goodwin Plan:—A scheme to enable consumers to ensure that the producers of the articles which they buy treat their workmen fairly as regards wages, working hours and decent working conditions, do not employ child labour and provide permanence and security of employment, has been put forward and is said to be making much progress in the United States. It is known as the Goodwin Plan. We reprint an outline from the Information Service of the Federal Council of Churches in America. The Plan may with suitable modifications, prove useful in promoting the sale of genuine Swadeshi goods. Labour leaders also may find some points of interest in the scheme.

Britain to Bihar:—When we commented last week on the poor response to the Lord Mayor's appeal in London, we had only the figures published of the few opening subscriptions before us. Tuesday's daily papers published the news that by the end of the third week of February more than £ 30,000 had been contributed to the Lord Mayor's Bihar Earthquake Relief Fund in London. The donors include most of the bigger commercial houses who carry on business with this country. One of them, Lloyds', subscribed £ 10,000. The remaining £ 23,000 is from six or seven other business firms. The Secretary of State for India, ex-Viceroy, ex-Governors and retired officers find prominent places in the list. This is considered remarkable in view of the fact that appeals were issued in London much later than in this country and contributions did not start coming in till the end of January.

"The Charity Match":—The cricket match which was played between the M. C. C. team from England and an Indian team in Bombay for the benefit of the Bihar Earthquake Fund proved rather a fiasco. The Indian papers were refused admission and they responded by completely ignoring the match. The Times of India alone reported the game and it was obliged to note, the large number of vacant seats in the public galleries. Four men of the team, it is stated, have been offered jobs as coaches and are likely to remain behind training young Indians to win future matches. Meanwhile, the Disarmament Conference, which finds itself at a loose end, may devote its attention to the vexed question of what is known as "body bowling".

BOMBAY, MARCH 10, 1934.

CHRISTIAN COLLEGES.

Reuter has sent a summary of the speech which Lord Lothian made at the Mansion House in London presumably in pursuance of the decision of the Committee to which we referred in a recent issue. He spoke of the great part which Colleges would play in the India of tomorrow and of the need of making the six Colleges on behalf of which the appeal was made, capable of making an adequate contribution to India's future. The reforms of the Lindsay Commission, he maintained, would result in sounder education; the colleges would be in closer touch with the lives of the people; they would be less bookish, more human, less examination ridden, more Indian and more practical. Not a word about the "spear-head" policy in Lord Lothian's speech! If this mean that the Christian Colleges frankly abandon their attitude of aggression against the religions of India, comparable only to the hostility of Soviet Russia to Christianity, we welcome the change. Really, Christianity, living as it does in a very brittle glass house, can not afford to throw stones at other religions. It needs purification as much as, perhaps more than, any other religion and a co-ordinated attempt on the part of all to rid religion of its communal character and racial and colour prejudices, and to make it an elevating influence on individual and national character, will approve itself to thoughtful men and women in all parts of the world. Readers of the Reformer need no assurance that the teachings of Jesus are amongst the principal sources to which it looks for support and guidance. But we are convinced that Christ's teachings by themselves are not enough. They have no meaning to the Hindu, Muslim or Parsi except in relation to his ancestral faith. Proselytising as an aim of higher education is a ridiculous anomaly. This position is not a new one. It was that of the Raja Ram Mohun Roy and all Indian reformers since his time. The Raja had a fervent admiration for the teachings of Jesus and commended them in one of his first published books as embodying most excellent moral precepts to his countrymen. But he was strongly opposed to proselytising propaganda and one of his reasons for founding the Brahma Samaj was to counteract the activities which he regarded as mischievous, of Christian Missionaries in that direction.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, supporting Lord Lothian's appeal made some observations some of which, as reported by Reuter, are coloured by unconscious bias and some others of which are mutually contradictory. His Grace condemned our system of education as too utilitarian and too little directed to the development of character. In the same breath he declared that Britain had given India a great system of education and also given great men (presumably, the English professors). The Archbishop "in this connection" paid a glowing tribute to the Civil Service and said that the latter must inevitably give place to Indians but he hoped that there should still be a long time during which his fellow countrymen could guide Indians by their great traditions. Not the educational system but it is foreign domination which is uncongenial to the growth of character. The hope that Englishmen should be here to guide notwithstanding that Indians must inevitably displace them, is not distinguishable from the wish that Indians should remain as long as possible under their tutelage. All this has no bearing on the question whether India should continue to subsidise institutions while they retain their character as part of a proselytising organisation. The Archbishop wound up with a reference to democracy. He declared that one thing which daunted him as a member of the Joint Parliamentary Committee on Indian reform was the strength of caste and the bitterness of communal divisions. The Abbe du Bois was no admirer of Hinduism or the Hindus and, therefore, his observations on the caste system of which he had made a close study are especially worthy of consideration by open-minded outsiders like His Grace. "I am persuaded," the Abbe wrote, "that it is simply and solely due to the distribution of the people into castes that India did not lapse into barbarism, and that she preserved and perfected the arts and sciences of civilization while most other nations of the earth remained in a state of barbarism. I do not consider caste to be free from many great drawbacks; but I believe that the resulting advantages, in the case of a nation constituted like the Hindus, more than outweigh the resulting evils." Coming down several decades, read the testimony of an Englishman who held Hinduism and Hinduism in contempt, as much as the Catholic Abbe. "I firmly believe," wrote Meredith Townsend, "caste to be a marvellous discovery, a form of socialism which through ages has protected Hindu society from anarchy and from the worst evils of industrial and competitive life—it is an automatic poor law to begin with, and the strongest form known of trades union." In our own day, the great sociologist, Patrick Geddes, regarded the caste system as the crowning achievement of Indian social evolution. Of course, it has fallen on evil days and become petrified. Indian reformers have been at work trying to reform caste and other social institutions and their labours have borne fruit in no small measure. Apart from that, a caste is the most perfect form of democracy inasmuch as the equality of every one of its members is absolute and unqualified. Burke held that it is in the small platoon of our own social circles that the civic qualities are best cultivated. If democracy means real equality and not a blind to cover flagrant economic inequalities, the purest example of it is to be found in the constitution of a caste. The caste and the village, the twin foundations of the Indian socio-economic system, are excellent schools for the cultivation of democratic virtues. The Archbishop has merely repeated one of the shibboleths of well-meaning but prejudiced Christian Missionaries who—themselves a rigid caste vis a vis their Indian congregations—find caste the greatest obstacle to the success of their proselytising propaganda. If intellectual Englishmen of eminence like the Archbishop think that India can not have what is called democracy until she has substituted the class system of their own country for her castes, we, for one, viewing the question purely as a sociological issue, would rather do without democracy than sacrifice the right of Indians to order their own social evolution. The price which His Grace demands is not one which can be paid by a community which is not quite dead to itself.

THE INDIAN BUDGET.

Sir George Schuster has our sympathy. Over and above the normal requirements of the Central Government, he has to provide this time funds to help Bihar to rehabilitate herself from the effects of the earthquake and to finance the costly terrorist policy of the Government of Bengal. Additional taxation in the shape of excise duties on Indian-manufactured matches and sugar, and an enhanced import duty on raw tobacco, are to be levied. On the other hand, the export duty on raw hides is to be repealed and slight reductions are to be made in postal and telegraph charges counterbalanced by an increase in postal packet rates. The excise duty on Indian-made matches is an added burden on the rural population hard hit by the fall in the prices of agricultural produce. Matches fall in the category of necessities of life except in the case of smokers. The poorer classes should be spared this fresh impost. An enhanced duty on cigarettes and cigars will make up for the revenue which smokers contribute through the proposed duty on matches. The excise duty on Indian sugar which was protected only two years ago by a heavy import duty on foreign sugar, is not fair to those who started sugar factories relying on the protective duty. It is calculated to undermine confidence in Government's assurances regarding its fiscal policies. The remission of the export duty on raw hides at a time when fresh taxation has to be levied, is anomalous. This duty was intended to stimulate the production of leather, which it has been largely successful in doing. Apart from the loss to the leather industry, the revenue derived from the duty should not be sacrificed at this time. The reduction in the postage on letters under half a tola is less likely to benefit the poorest people than would a corresponding reduction in respect of postcards. The quarter anna which is remitted on letters should be remitted on postcards preferably. The Madras Booksellers' Association fear that the proposed increase in postal packet rates will vitally affect their trade. Their business in the main, they say, rests on sending our packet lots preliminary to actual publication and the increase of rates by three pice strikes at the root of their trade. A tax on knowledge is everywhere bad finance and we support the protest of the booksellers. The Finance Member is quite capable of finding less objectionable sources of taxation than those indicated in the foregoing observations.

The provision made to help Bihar has been severely criticised as totally inadequate by Babu Rajendra Prasad and Mr. S. Sinha. Both are responsible public men. The latter has held office as Finance Minister of Bihar. They are, besides, men whose outlook is not limited to their province. The Government of India will, we are sure, do their utmost to meet their complaint. The earthquake calamity is not of man's making. It will be many years before the Province regains her normal condition. The reconstruction of Bihar will cost a very large sum of money and will cover practically the present generation which will not live to reap its full benefits. It seems, therefore, a proper object for a loan rather than for being financed out of revenue. The whole amount will not be needed at once but the announcement of a loan will put heart in the Government and the people of Bihar as they will be assured that the work of reconstruction will not be hampered for want of funds. We do not see anything in the speech of the Finance Member to show that he is opposed to such a proposal.

As regards the subvention to Bengal, it is largely the fault of the other provinces which had sat quiet while the provincial Government was pursuing a wasteful and ineffective policy regardless of cost. We have more than once pointed out that the problem of coping with the terrorist movement is an All-India one, and must be taken over by the Central Government which, with the co-operation and support of the whole country, can deal with it more effectively, quickly and economically. The Government of India will, of course, have the right to see that its present subvention is not regarded as an encouragement to persevere in a policy which must involve an indefinite repetition of similar subventions. If, on no other ground, on that of its uneconomic character alone, the present policy of the Bengal Government must be abandoned in favour of a less costly and more conciliatory policy. The Bihar earthquake and the Bengal financial crisis, are both warnings against the statutory extinction of British India as an organic whole. Ours has largely been a voice in the wilderness. But at last the danger of the proposal is being realised. Sir George Schuster in the course of a debate on Thursday, said: "One of the great dangers of the future is that with greater responsibility on the part of Provincial Governments, problems may not be considered from the point of view of India as a whole. There are strong centrifugal tendencies which would work against any sound economic planning. We have tried to get the provinces together in conferences on matters such as Rail-Road, the Co-operative movements and sugar, and we have the Agricultural Advisory Council. We have done our best to advance on these lines, but the powers of the Government of India are limited, because, in all matters relating directly to economic activity, real powers rest with the Provincial Governments." The position will be infinitely worse when the White Paper proposal is carried out.

The Nazi and The Communist:—General Goering, Nazi leader, gave an interview to the Berlin correspondent of the London Daily Mail stressing the fact that Germany supports Britain's colonial policy. The German leader expressed violent antagonism to Gandhiji and revealed that some time back he refused to see a colleague of the Mahatma's—probably, Mr. Subhas Bose—at an accidental meeting. The climax of General Goering's interview, however, was reached when he remarked that Gandhiji was an "anti-British Bolshevik agent in India." Incidentally, it may be remarked that the British Socialist Premier took a leaf out of the Nazi book when he refused to meet the hunger-marchers' deputation on the ground that they were inspired by Communist ideas. General Goering has evidently not read Stalin's address to the Sixteenth Party Congress in 1930 which contains a repudiation of Gandhiji. "The gentlemen of the bourgeoisie," he said, "expect to flood these countries (India, Indo-China, Indonesia, Africa, etc.,) with blood and to rely on police bayonets, calling to their help people like Gandhi...Tsarism had a whole herd of helpers of the type of Gandhi, in the person of Liberal compromisers of every kind—which, however, led to nothing but disappointment in the end." (p. 21) Surely it is too much for Herr Goering to believe that the Communist Party would have as its agent in India an individual who is viewed in this light by its head. The only probable explanation of his expressing these views is that he is playing on British prejudices, and the British reactions to the recent Moscow trial have revealed a vulnerable point. General Goering's reference to blood relationship between the British and the Germans is not so much a guarantee of support to Britain as an appeal for help at a time when Europe is almost reaching unity in its resistance to Nazi methods. The interview is of no value or interest to India, though it is significant as a move in European politics. So far as we are aware, no Indian nationalist has appealed to Germany for support. Dr. Richter's speech at Aligarh reveals that there is a genuine desire on the part of Germany to maintain cultural relations with India.

TRAVANCORE IN TRANSITION.

Sir Mahomed Habibullah, lately Member of the Executive Council of the Governor General, assumed charge of the office of Dewan of Travancore early this week. Sir Mahomed served as a member of the Executive Council of the Governor of Madras before he was promoted to Delhi. In both these high and responsible offices as well as in the capacity of leader of the Indian delegation to the first Cape Town Conference (which achieved a notable success) and of the delegation to the League of Nations Assembly three years ago, he himself won the confidence of the Indian public. His greatest asset is that he has none of the showy qualities which if they excite admiration also arouse distrust in the minds of less gifted men. It is vain nowadays to say of any Indian that he is free from communal feeling. Our British friends will not let him forget that he is a Hindu, Muslim, or Parsi even though he himself has ceased to be conscious of the fact in public affairs. Sir Mahomed's communalism is of the healthy, harmonising type. It is based on a realisation of the utter impossibility of one community in India advancing at the expense of another. That is why his appointment to the Chief Ministership of a State with the far-reaching Hindu theocratic traditions of Travancore, has been received with general satisfaction, even by orthodox Hindus who occupy in Travancore a position of social influence which they do not possess in any other part of the country; and also by the most articulate party in the State which stands for "Travancore for the Travancoreans." There is no Muslim problem in Travancore. The Muslims form but a small fraction of the population about 7 per cent. They are either cultivators or traders, and their laws and customs have little in common with Muslims outside of Malabar. Christians, on the other hand, form more than 30 percent of the population. They are mostly Syrians and their presence in Travancore as a community dates from the second century after Christ. They are in fact the oldest Christians in India. They did not contribute a problem until about twenty years ago, but they do so now. The communal problem in Travancore is a Christian problem. The new Dewan has no greater task than that of reconciling the reasonable claims of the Christian population with the maintenance of the integrity of Travancore as an ancient and historical State. Travancore has one of the highest proportion of well educated men and women in the whole country; and Sir Mahomed can count upon their support in the equitable settlement of this question. The condition of the depressed classes, is another subject which will claim his immediate attention, and here too he will have the support of public opinion not only in Travancore but in the whole of India. The young Maharaja has already given proof of his concern for his subjects of the untouchable classes. It may be noted in this connection that, though the position of some of these groups is the worst in the country, some others, notably, the Ezhavas have made enormous strides in education and economic and social well-being on their own self-reliant lines.

There is a faint feeling of concern which one hears expressed regarding the seemingly too rapid transition from ancient conservatism to extreme modernism in Travancore. Western society is now in a state of unstable equilibrium owing to the old moorings having been destroyed by the War and even more by the Peace which followed it. It will be sometime before Europe settles down sufficiently to be model. The wise conservatism of Sir Mahomed Habibullah will be of great benefit to the State in its re-actions to modern ideas.

[Mar. 10]

AN ENGLISH VIEW OF RADHAKRISHNAN'S PHILOSOPHY.

(BY SIR LALUBHAI SAMALDAS).

Since the time that human beings began to exercise the powers of thinking and feeling, they have tried to solve the mystery that still surrounds the creation and guidance of Universe including Life and Matter. The first Mantra of the Isa Upanishad speaks of the Supreme Being (Isa) pervading and enveloping whatever is existent in this Universe. The Rishis of the Upanishad period visualized this Supreme Power more through intuitions than by the use of reasoning faculties. The Hindus believe that these Seers of the Upanishads were the earliest human beings to tackle the problem of creation in a manner which has stood the critical examination of philosophers in successive ages and even now elicits the admiration and respect of thinkers and philosophers in all civilized countries. The Rishis (Seers) gave their experience of the Revelation of the Supreme Being through the Mantras of the Upanishads. They were handicapped in exactly doing so on account of two difficulties. The first difficulty was that of a finite being trying to understand the Infinite in all its aspects and the second was due to the imperfections of the language to depict properly what they realized. Moreover, different Seers visualized the Infinite in certain aspects only and consequently the narration of these experiences was neither a connected whole nor a repetition of one and the same experience or similar Revelation. Shankaracharya was the first philosopher of repute who saw unity through all these apparent contradictions and on the basis of that Unity founded his philosophy of Vedantism. This philosophy is recognised as Vedanta by the vast majority of Hindus and almost all non-Indian students of philosophy. Having completed this almost impossible task of framing a synthetic philosophy based on the narration of experiences of Revelation by different Rishis of the Vedic period, Sankara was faced with another and a greater difficulty which has been very clearly expressed by C. E. M. Joad in his "Counter-attack from the East"* in the following terms :

"the difficulty raised by the second question is no less formidable. This world, it is obvious, is not perfect; it contains evil and pain. Either, the we must say that God deliberately willed it to produce something less good than Himself, or persuade ourselves that these things, evil and pain, are in some sense illusory."

Sankara and his followers, including Sir Radhakrishna, have all tried to evade this difficulty by saying that not only evil but everything else except Para-Brahman is mere Maya and Mayaveda is the name given to this hypothesis which was not considered satisfactory by the later philosophers like Ramanujacharya who modified to a certain extent the pure Advaitism of Sankara.

In the Prologue of Joad's Book named the West and the East, the author gives the substance of Radhakrishnan's attack on the growing materialism of the West which he considers to be quite justifiable. While appreciating the good practical results of modern science in the following terms, "in a hundred ways it has brightened and cleansed human existence and because of it, the Western World is to-day a franker, a saner and, in some ways, a happier place than it has ever been in the past," he adds that "while human desires are neither good nor evil but mixed, owing to the fact that we still live in a state of international brigandage, they are in their social and collective expression mainly harmful." He adds that it is not enough that a civilized man is not worse than before but that it is necessary that he should be very much better if he wants to escape destruction by the forces loosened by science, in case they are not controlled by him. He strongly criticizes the attitude of scientists when laboriously they explain that science is 'ethically and socially mental' and says "It does not seem to occur to them that they too are citizens and that it is their duty either to take a hand in administering the fruits of their work or to withhold their results until society shows itself fit to be entrusted with them."

Referring to the scientists' disinclination to come to any conclusion unless they have sufficient data for the purpose, Joad says that human beings must live and living involves the adoption of conclusions before they have been established. He adds 'In a word to live is to take risks; so is to govern, to administer and to believe.' He thinks that philosophy in the West has often lost living contact with contemporary life and that when it has lost such contact it has been least fruitful as philosophy. He adds 'Philosophy no doubt, must be different from life, but it should not be indifferent'. As regards Religion, he begins by saying "Our Religion is one which many profess, but few believe" and then adds "In general, the spirit of the West is markedly hostile to religion in at least two senses of that ambiguous word. It distrusts supernaturalism and is sceptical of any transcendental account of the nature of this Universe."

Another complaint of Joad against the modern Westerner is that he does not acknowledge any scale of values. "Modern Civilization," he says, "is the result of endowing with the fruits of the work of a dozen men of genius a population which is emotionally at the level of savages and culturally at that of school boys," he goes on to say "There was never more leisure at man's disposal for the living of good life; there was never less knowledge of how to live it." All these defects are summarized as follows by the author "scepticism in the matter of belief, guidelessness in matters of conduct, indifference in regard to value, these are the out-standing factors in the mood of the West."

Turning to the present day, civilization of the East Joad says that the East values machines not as ends in themselves, but as a means to ends beyond themselves and adds "Unlike most westerners, they can sit still and listen, they can bear themselves by themselves and many possess the technique of solitude and are trained in the art of meditation." The author realizes that on account of too much preoccupation with spiritual values—"The life of action and ambition has never had quite the same hold upon men in the East as it has in the West." At the end of this prologue, the author says "The West has energy and vitality of civilization still comparatively young, yet does not know into what channels to direct them. The East possess the tradition and the knowledge but is without the vitality to make the tradition live or the knowledge spread and is in the danger of being swamped by the vigorous tides that flow from the West.—Each lacks something that is essential, each has something to give—can they, then, be brought together?"

The Book under review is an honest, serious attempt to show how this blending can be done. Those who are interested in this subject can do no better than spare some time to go carefully through this book and study the various problems put very lucidly before them by the author.

India Woman's Exploit:—Finding the door of the lock-up ajar, an Indian woman prisoner escaped from the Cantonment Police Station—Rangoon.

THE CODEX SINAITICUS*

(BY DAN B. BRUMMITT)

One day in the summer of 1931 I had an experience in Russia which bridged for me sixteen centuries, and took me back to the days of "In hoc signo vinces" and the Nicene Creed. It was all the more thrilling because it could not have happened anywhere else, and recent news from Europe convinces me that it never can happen again. A small party of us were visiting a library; once the Imperial Library, in Leningrad. Since most of the company were either preachers or otherwise related to church life, we had one supreme objective; we all wanted to see the Codex Sinaiticus; probably the oldest manuscript of the Bible now in the world. After slow wanderings through long galleries crammed with volumes we knew we could not read, we came at last to a room where a little old man, incredibly bent and wrinkled, stood by a flat-topped pedestal very much like a small reading desk. As soon as we moved into position, tourist-fashion, the old gentlemen, who told us he had been in charge of this treasure for fifty years, carefully removed the wrappings, and stood back.

There within our reach, like a great family Bible, was this greatest of all the world's book treasures; a book which has just sold for half a million dollars, and a bargain at the price. The smooth parchment pages were wonderfully clean and fresh and the penwork of the copyist, who had finished his work almost 1,600 years ago, was clearer and more legible than the print of that day's Moscow News. After the first awed and reverent silence, timidly I proposed a most audacious request, "Were photographs permitted?" The old gentleman said, "Of course;" and we gasped. Permission to point a camera at this priceless manuscript was as near unbelievable as anything I had heard or seen in Russia. Alas, my camera, according to the usual regulation imposed by libraries and galleries and museums, had been checked at the entrance.

The afternoon was far spent, and the distance to the main entrance of the library was more than I had reckoned on. Besides, twice I lost my way, turned back, and precious time went by while I made signs to the checkroom man and then retraced my steps. And I have to record, with disappointment and no small shame, that the effort was in vain. The venerable guardian of the manuscript stood by the pedestal, so that he might be included in the picture, as he deserved to be. But with every minute the light had dimmed, and by this time so little was filtering through the dusty windows that the result was an almost meaningless blur. Others tried, but with no better success. Nevertheless, we had our adventure, for the little old man was most accommodating, and he permitted two or three of us to touch the historic pages. With infinite reverence and care I put my hand on the book, and gently turned its parchment sheets until I came to the first page of John's gospel. And then, calling from the vasty deep of the years' memories what I once knew by heart, I spelled out, in the perfectly legible Greek characters, the opening words of the first chapter, which, as we have it in the King James Version, read, "In the beginning was the Word."

In a moment my eyes found it difficult to do their duty; I was seeing more than the bold Greek capitals. I was seeing the man who had written the words on a snowy white antelope skin. His had been a labour of love for the Christians of the early part of the fourth century. And I, from a land he could not know existed, was reading the work of his pen in the early part of the twentieth century.

*From the "Indian Witness."

The story of Sinaiticus is a great story, and can never be too often told. When the copyist wrote, Constantine was Emperor, the first of the Roman Emperors to accept the Christian faith; that same Constantine who thought he saw the Cross in the sky: "By this conquer." It was the time of the Nicene Creed; Athanasius contra mundum. The long agonies of the days of Christian martyrdom in the arena were almost over. Constantinople had just been founded, and was beginning its sixteen centuries of glory and humiliation, splendour, and squalor; battle, siege, and conquest. Now, after a thousand years as capital of a Christian empire, and five and a half centuries as the capital of a Mohammedan empire, its glory has departed. Its proud imperial name is changed to Istanbul, and it has the status of a worn-out and decaying seaport.

As I looked at Codex I was seeing also that indomitable German scholar, another Constantine, the great Tischendorf, whose romantic adventures in his search for, discovery and recovery of this very manuscript are among the most fascinating in all the history of Bible preservation. Tischendorf knew, from his studies of Bible manuscripts, that the same Eusebius, Bishop of Caesarea, who has told us a little extravagantly what a noble Christian Constantine the Great was, was commissioned by the emperor to set up a body of scribes who should make complete copies of the holy writings of the Christians. This meant, of course, the books of the Old Testament as well as the New, and apocryphal writings also. The result was the production of perhaps fifty copies of what we now know as the Bible. It was probably the first time that the Book had been treated as a literary unit. The copies were distributed through the empire, being placed in important churches under the care of the bishops and other clergy. But centuries of confusion followed. Already the fierce men of the North were moving on the Roman peace, and sacred books had to share the fortunes of the times. Today only two manuscripts of those days are in existence. The other is the Codex Vaticanus, which, as its name indicates, is in the Vatican Library at Rome.

Constantine Tischendorf was a German scholar of ability and persistence. He had already made a name by his brilliant uncovering of the Ephraim manuscript—which is another romantic story. He was sure that somewhere in the world many precious old manuscripts of the Bible must still be hidden away. He sought them out as a modern detective would search for the evidences of crime, following up every slightest clue. One day, ninety years ago, his quest brought him to a Greek church monastery at the foot of Mount Sinai. As he sat by the fire he saw a basket filled with fragments of mouldy old parchment. A monk told him they were to be burned, being the Sinaitic equivalent for junk, and too much in the way. Tischendorf examined this "junk," and his astonishment saw at once that it was part of a manuscript of very great age. He had come to the peninsula in search of early parchments, but here was something older than any he had dreamed of discovering. So little did the monks realize what these irreplaceable pages were that they made him a present of this lot, quite casually.

He came back to Europe with forty-three pages; he copied them, described them to his fellow scholars, and determined to get more if and when he could. For years he kept secret the place of his find, and then, after getting the support of Czar Alexander II, titular head of the Greek Orthodox Church, he was able to resume his search. He went back to the peninsula of Mount Sinai twice before he was able even so much as to be sure that any more pages existed. He would have failed, after all, if on his last visit, and at the last moment—or so the story goes—had he not become involved in a friendly discussion with one of the humble monks of the monastery. This man took him to his cell and unrolled before him from a cloth the very pages which Tischendorf had thus far vainly sought. Czar Alexander, that same emperor who freed the serfs of Russia, had financed Tischendorf's later search, and he gave monks of Sinai $3,000 for their ancient property. So the parchment became the chief library and religious treasure of the Russian Empire, and it was placed in the Imperial Library of St. Petersburg.

In 1914 came the World War, and in 1917 the Russian Revolution. The Codex Sinaiticus stayed on in the library, watched over by a little man who grew to a great age while he kept at his post. And there it was that I saw and handled and wept over it, less than three years ago.

This parchment contains the whole of the New Testament, and parts of the Old, as well as the apocryphal "Epistle of Barnabas," and other fragments. It is in Greek, written in "uncials," that is, capital letters, without spacing between words, or much punctuation, as we know it, and with many marks of additions and corrections by later hands—some of them written centuries afterward. That it is one of the first manuscripts to include the whole Bible is probable because we know, before the fourth century, that the sacred records existed only as separate books or groups of books, written on papyrus rolls. How it came into the possession of the monks of Mount Sinai nobody can say. It was written, probably, at Alexandria, the then capital of Egypt, or at Caesarea, on the coast of Palestine.

In the last days of last year the Codex Sinaiticus passed out of the hands of the Russian Government. It was bought by the British Museum, and the terms of the purchase are well worth telling. The British Government will pay half the price, and the museum will appeal for small private gifts to make up the half a million dollars. The gifts will come, make no doubt of that. Even if it means sacrifice, thousands of British Christians will be glad to share in the cost. To my mind that is far better than if some wealthy individual gave it all out of his swollen superabundance.

I had dreamed that the Codex would figure in a great revival of religion in Russia. There is much in Russia to-day whose wisdom one must admire; for instance, these four great ideals of the Soviets; (1) that everybody must share with everybody else, so that all may have something; (2) that the strong must do more, in order that the weak may not have to do too much; (3) that all the people must be "converted" to the new ideals of the state; and (4) that, in time of great stress, every citizen must be willing to give up even his life for the common good—not in war only, but in peace as well. My dream was a hope. I hoped that one day some young Russian student might find his way into the great library, and discover this wonderful old manuscript. I imagined that he would read it, first with an amused curiosity, and then with growing interest. I hoped that as he read there would break in on him a realization that many of the ideals which he, as a member of the Russian new order, had accepted, were actually written in this book. And I hoped that he would at last come to see that these principles were very old; older than Stalin, older than Lenin, older than Karl Marx; that they were at least three hundred years older than the 1,600 year-old manuscript in which he found them. And then, I dreamed, this young Russian student would go to his fellows and tell them what he had found, and would show them that here was not only all that was finest in the Soviet philosophy, but also much more and better teaching. He would say, or thus ran my dream, "Why, here, and not in the icons which the priests told our fathers were holy, is the true picture of Jesus Christ. He was a peasant like our own peasants. He knew what was in our hearts. He was more truly a revolutionary in his day than Lenin has been in ours, and he read more deeply into our hearts than ever our great leader did."

And so I dream that by means of a monk's ancient pen work Jesus might come back to Russia, in newer, clearer, truer ways than when Russian choirs sang his praises and the nation's leaders rejected his words. But that dream is ended. The great Codex is going to London, so that no Russian student may ever find it in his wanderings about the library. But I am not really disappointed. Jesus is not dependent on manuscripts. By one path or another, the Russian youth who is to be the rediscoverer of Jesus Christ for his country will come to his great moment. He may find it, as Luther did, in some attempt to test the old faith; or as Lew Wallace did, in an attempt to retell the story of Jesus of Nazareth. But some how it will happen.

And in the meantime, I have had my little adventure with the Codex Sinaiticus, as Tischendorf had with it the adventure of his life. For what it meant to me I shall be grateful all my days.

THE EIGHTH BARROWS LECTURES •

(By MR. V. CHAKKARAI, MADRAS.)

My memory turns back to my school day when the first Barrows lecturer, Dr. Barrows, came to Madras, and discoursed on "The Worldwide Supremacy of the Christian Religion". He was a scholar with vast stores of knowledge as evidenced by copious citations from standard authors. He appealed to an Indian audience to accept Christianity because it stood in the name of western civilisation. Those were the time of a pathetic belief in progress, as it seems to us now, and Christianity appeared to him to need no other apology. Nay, it was almost identical with western civilization. Dr. Fairbairn was sent next who with soft eloquence upheld the banner of the philosophy of Christianity. Then came Dr. Cuthbert Hall twice, a unique honor, and he captured our religious imagination by his eloquent analysis of the sublimities of the Oriental consciousness in relation to the mysteries of the Christian faith. He was an intense spirituality that saw into the tragedy of western civilization, and he turned away from it to the primal fountains of the Christian Revelation. After him have come a line of preachers and theologians all of whom I have had the good fortune to listen to. The last of them all, a goodly company, Dr. Shailer Mathews, of the Chicago Divinity School, has just finished his course on Western civilization and Christianity, and the readers of this paper will no doubt allow me to set down some of the impressions left on my mind.

1. The contrast between the first lecturer and the eighth, not in point of learning, but of view points, is the measure of the change that has come over men's mind since the end of the nineteenth century. To Dr. Barrows, western civilisation was itself the product of Christianity, and the cause would seem to have been changed into its effect. It was firm and solid ground. It seemed then to my schoolboy mind, as it does to-day, that to call on Indians to accept Christianity because Christian nations were the masters of the real world was but adding insult to injury. On the contrary, it was just the one way of rousing patriotic feelings against the very name of Christianity. I felt as an instinct in my very blood that the Christian Revelation was from another source and, appealed to other aspects of our consciousness. 'My kingdom is not of this world' said the Lord. That is the answer to all such racial claims on the ground of Christianity. To-day Dr. Shailer Matthews can hardly speak of Christianity as an aspect of western civilisation—so enormous has been the mental change wrought by the years of the Great War and after. Of even the influence of Christianity in Western history, his tone was one of hesitancy and of moderation. From being the sacred Ganga flowing through the fertile plains of Western Europe and America, Christianity has dwindled into a tiny stream, visible occasionally but oftentimes lost amidst western life. As a matter of history, the latter is more accurate than the former. The one great merit of Dr. Matthews' treatment is his desire not to claim too much for Christianity as a factor and fact in western civilization.

2. Two remarks I have heard regarding these lectures to one of which the lecturer referred as proceeding from Christians. They were not evangelical, that is, they were not meant to convert the non-Christian. The lecturer admitted with frankness that that was not the purpose or purport of his lectures, and there is an end to it. The other remark I heard from a prominent Hindu gentleman at the close of the last lecture. Dr. Matthews was very broad-minded, and there was nothing narrow in him. This comes to the same thing—he was not urging the claims of Christianity, as they are unfortunately called, in an exclusive way on his hearers which must have come as a great relief to the above gentleman and the like of him. Dr. Matthews claimed to study the social process set up by Christianity as a scientific student. In doing so, he set down things as they have been and are, and not as he would have them to be. He came before us, not as a theologian, but as a student of western civilization. Therefore, however much we may have wished that he had adopted the former attitude, we have no right to judge his lectures except as history. On this question of history we have the right to say whether we agree or not with him.

My present impression is that, while being very fair in his description of facts and institutions, his analysis was not deep enough. Let me explain myself. Christianity and Western civilisation are two great historical phenomena, and it would have been very much to the purpose to tell us what their genius respectively is. Of course, I am perfectly aware that a theologian like Karl Barth would deny that Christianity or the Christian Revelation is history; rather he would say it is super-history, that is, the ingression of God at a particular point or points in human history. But apart from this criticism, one should have liked to be informed as to what it was, as it came out of its original home amidst the culture in Jesus' days. If Christianity is to be really grasped of its original spirit, one must understand its creator. And how could he do it without entering into the significance of the culture of His times? For that is the very postulate of all historical study, the history of a historical figure in the light of his social environment. Of course, it might be argued that Jesus was not the creature of His age, but was far above it, in His moral and spiritual insight. But this does not free us from the duty of getting a true idea of the significance of the culture of the East of His times—and before and after, too. Such an idea would have enabled us to see how His message was understood or misunderstood in the Greco-Roman world.

In this connection, it is interesting to note the lack of understanding of the eastern soul of the early centuries of the Christian era and of the centuries before. All European Church history proceeds on the assumption that there was then no other culture and civilization than what is called the classical civilization of Greece and Rome. After making some reference to the religious conditions in Palestine at the time of our Lord, historians plunge headlong into a description, elaborate and elegant, of classical religions and civilizations. But there was a vast world lying in the East where great ideas were fermenting in the springtime. It is out of this matrix that Christianity arose as Islam did later on. My complaint is that there was not even a suspicion of these in these lectures. Till recently there has been a conspiracy of silence on the part of western scholarship regarding this. It is quite true that Christianity after Paul and even he himself in certain respects, were profoundly influenced by classical civilisation. But it was essentially part of a great world culture, that of the East (not excluding India). Oswald Spengler, in his monumental treatise on The Decline of the West, has given to it a new name, The Magian culture and soul. The Christianity that is treated of as an aspect of western civilisation is not this Magian religion, as Jesus Christ taught it and lived it, but the transvaluation of it in terms far different. I can make this more clear by an illustration used by the lecturer. He said that the Logos of St. John's gospel is from Greek philosophy, probably neo-Platonism. Now, this is an old view that has been disputed by none more strongly than by Albert Schweitzer in St. Paul and His Interpreters. His theory is that it was thoroughly Jewish; and Spengler says that it is not a doctrine of Hellenism at all but is part of the great Magian culture, the Jewish, Babylonian, Persian and Arabian culture. What really happened is that an eastern concept became changed into a Greek one, and was subjected to all the logic belonging to it. Therefore, what is really meant is Greek Christianity and later Latin and Western Christianity is an aspect of Western civilisation.

Now, the lecturer should have told us what he means, by Western civilisation. For one thing, I think he meant to say that the classical civilisation of Rome and Greece belong to the same category as Western civilisation. But this cannot be considered in that light. As Spengler points out, the modern Western can no more understand it than he understands really Chinese and Indian cultures. However this may be, Western civilisation is a much later creation, springing from the Germanic migrations. It was born and grew up in Western Europe and does not include Russia nor much of South-Eastern Europe. What is the real genesis of this spirit, called by Spengler, the Faustian Soul? It is called the longing for infinity—extension in space. I am not competent to pronounce any judgment on such a matter which must be decided by western scholars. Besides, Spengler has too much contempt for what he calls English philosophy which is another side of English history and life. My point, however, is that the lecturer should have tried to relate these two forces, such Christianity as there is in the west to the organic manifestations of the western spirit. To-day I find that the best minds of the West, specially in Germany, are making the clear-cut distinction between the Oriental Christian Faith and the Germanic Spirit. I take it that the attempt to Hitlerise the German Protestant church is really one aimed at the elimination of all the eastern elements in Christianity. I came across something astounding in a German creed of a certain German Church party that speaks of the German God and Jesus as the ally of the Germans. This is Germanisation with a vengeance. If, this phenomenon has any deep roots there, as I believe it has, we have really reached the final stage of the elimination of Christianity and the adoption consciously of the Germanic or the Faustian Soul, rather the emergence of the latent. Therefore, instead of leading us into these vital problems of how the western spirit has reacted to and rebelled against the eastern religion, the lecturer trotted up the now ancient idea that Christianity has been slowly permeating Western civilisation and gave us the hope rather intangible—that we are moving slowly—that is that we are moving—that is the doctrine of a foolish evolution—towards a complete Christianisation in some distant ages. Neither the history of Western civilisation nor of the Christian evangel warrants any such hope.

THE GOODWIN PLAN.

In response to the many inquiries recently received with reference to the origin and merits of the so-called "Goodwin Plan" the following results of a careful examination of the money-raising proposal promulgated by the Goodwin Corporation are made available to the readers of Information Service of the Federal Council of Church, in America.

The Goodwin Corporation, housed in the Mather Tower, Chicago, is, according to its own publicity material, "a business concern, the primary purpose of which is to create a revitalized, interested consumer audience parallel to the readership of newspapers, in order that manufactures who engage us and our sales stimulative field force may be able to advertise effectively and sell their wares profitably. The consumer audience is planned to be contacted, organized and interested by local point-of-contact workers, who have been and are being selected from the societies of the churches because this source provides persons of excellent character and reliability. These workers will be compensated on a commission basis for the sales which they bring about among the house-wives of their communities and, under the Goodwin plan, the workers may assign their earnings to their church or division of their church."

The details of the plan are simple. The local church, or its woman's society or other church organisation is to appoint as "broadcasters" a number of women—as far as possible one for every ten families, after adding to the number within the church membership an equal number of families from the general community. Each of these "broadcasters" personally signs an agreement "to cooperate with and aid the Goodwin plan exclusively and to refrain from any connections with any similar work or plan for the period of thirty-six (36) months from date hereof." It is her duty to secure the pledges of ten housewives "to accept and sign the Goodwin Church Loyalty Purchase List from which to purchase such articles and products as they are willing to purchase"; to collect, sort, tabulate and forward express collect to the Corporation once each month the "evidences of sale" specified by the Corporation and saved by such housewives. In return the Corporation will forward its check for 2 per cent of the total purchase price represented by such "evidences of sale."

The "broadcaster's" contract reserves to the purchaser and to the "broadcaster" the right to cross off such articles on the list as they do not wish included in the pledge, and continues, "But, it will be our effort to have the housewife leave thereon as many products as possible." The list will include all types of retail goods, groceries, drugs, automotive supplies, wearing apparel and miscellaneous household and other equipment. The list has not yet been compiled. The manufacturers will be approached after the market is assured and the "broadcasters" contracts have been signed.

The manufacturer listed by the Corporation agrees to pay the two per cent on proved sales to the Goodwin Plan field-force and 1½ per cent on the total proved sales to the Goodwin Corporation, and, furthermore, to spend three per cent of the wholesale value of such sales in a given area in newspaper or other space advertising in that area.

The value of the plan to manufacturer lies principally in the fact that only one brand in any line of goods is admitted to the list. Also, if the plan succeeds it should allow of a considerable reduction in his independent sales force.

The plan has been widely recommended on the basis of the Corporation's pledge that no products shall appear on the list unless the manufacturers are "committed to the upholding" of four "Great Social Principles." The Corporation states that it will require the manufacturers to:

1. Pay a living wage in accordance with the concepts of the present era and as are advocated by eminent thinkers. By a living wage is understood not merely enough to enable men to survive physically, but such a wage as shall permit them to live with a degree of decency and comfort and at the same time may enable them to make provision for sickness, education, disability, unemployment and old age. This wage shall be not lower than that established as a minimum by the Federal Government for the various occupations in industry. Further, as heretofore stated, this basic wage shall be subject to a Retroactive Upward Revision, in that proportion as will be determined by ourselves and our advisors . . . but which percentage shall be determined and be set before we contract with manufacturers . . . and which percentage will go into retroactive effect after the operation of the Goodwin Plan for one year on the basis of the profits which may be brought about through increased sales, produced by the Goodwin Plan field-force, and this principle shall prevail for the period of the contract.

2. Provide reasonable working hours for labor as will provide sufficient leisure for spiritual, educational and cultural opportunities; to conform, in times of emergencies, to those hours established by the Federal Government, but in no case to exceed an 8-hour day and a 6-day week.

3. Provide decent working conditions for employees, especially as may relate to sanitation, light and ventilation, safety devices, protection against occupational diseases, injuries and mortality.

4. Abstain from employing child labour, meaning agreement to employ no person under sixteen years of age in any manufacturing or mechanical process (even after present Federal emergency insurances may have passed) except that persons between fourteen and sixteen may be employed in other types of work for a period not to exceed three hours per day, and those hours between 7 A.M. and 7 P.M., in such work as shall not interfere with hours of day school.

5. Work toward security and Permanency of Employment, meaning to agree to work toward the attainment of security and continuity of employment for workers, along the lines which have been worked out by certain leading manufacturers."

Nothing appears here about a written agreement. The guarantee stressed is that of "insistence." Thus, "the Goodwin Corporation will impress such insistences upon manufacturers in the terms of its reserved rights not to accept the sales-stimulating responsibility of any product of and not to avail the potential sales-energy of the Goodwin Plan field force to any manufacturer who does not likewise clearly comprehend his responsibility."

ty to aid in supporting the mass purchasing power from the additional new profits that may come from additional new sales through the efforts of the Goodwin plan field force." And further:

"Hence, to aid in actualizing those principles..... we propose: To set up a social justice committee composed of one representative each of Protestant, Catholic and Jewish denomination from within our own organization, whose duty it shall be to see that the Principles of social justice enunciated here are understood, and accorded with in principle, by those manufacturers before we offer them the sales stimulating service of the Goodwin Plan; and to investigate and to endeavor to adjust any charges of violation in these principles in any such manufacturing establishment; and in the event of failing to adjust the matter, it shall be referred to an Arbitration Committee of three to be selected one by the Goodwin Corporation, one by the manufacturer and the third by these two; which Committee shall consider the complaints made and the decision of this Arbitration Committee to be final in all matters pertaining to the alleged violation of these principles; and in the event that a manufacturer refuses or fails to correct and adjust such offenses within a period of six months, the Goodwin Corporation may cancel its contract with said manufacturer in accordance with provisions to this effect, which shall be incorporated in the contract with said manufacturers.

"It is understood that the Goodwin Corporation shall have the right to review the records of manufacturers who may be availed the Goodwin Plan field force, to determine the manner in which they have carried out the provisions in Paragraph 1, with respect to sharing additional new profits with their employees and to cancel the contract of any manufacturer who fails or refuses to carry out the mutually agreed upon provision.

"Good faith and mutual confidence is the Basis. As adherence to lofty ideals and decent practices depends on voluntary support, based on mutual confidence, (rather than enforcement by law) the Goodwin Corporation has adopted the above principles in good faith and expresses the belief that all manufacturers whose products may be listed under the Goodwin Plan, will willingly carry them out in the same sincere spirit."

According to an advertisement in the Editor and Publisher, (New York) a country-wide canvass of the churches has been made by over 800 employed organizers, many of them ministers previously unemployed; "broadcasters" or "field-sales-stimulators" have been "hired," and it was stated on December 16 that 250,000 local agents representing church women's societies would probably have been signed up by December 31. The number of locally employed organizers has now increased to 1,200 and the broadcasters to 206,000.

MR. SUBHAS BOSE'S NEW PARTY.

A three-point plan for India's future was outlined by Mr. Subhas Bose in a statement to Reuter at Geneva. Mr. Bose said:—

- (1) India must be consolidated as a free nation under a strong central government before she can hope for internal reconstruction and security from external attack.
- (2) A strong and disciplined party must be organised before we can hope for a national government; and the entire nation must be brought under the influence and control of this party.
- (3) This party must stand for the masses as distinct from the vested interests. It must stand for justice for all sections of the people and for freedom of every kind—whether political, economic or, social.

"To ensure justice and freedom for all," he said, "the party must stand for the principle of equality and work for the destruction of all artificial barriers whether of religion, creed, caste, sex or wealth.

"Thus it should aim at a really democratic State in which we shall all be equal and in which there will be no problem of minorities.

"I would call this party the "Samyavadi Sangha" of India.

"The immediate problem before this party would be to transform the Indian National Congress into an organ of the masses of India. Bitter experience has taught me that it is futile to expect the Congress to adopt a radical programme until we can first alter the composition of that body. I disagree with the Communists when they allege that the Congress is essentially a bourgeois institution and is incapable of this transformation.

"To alter the present composition of the Congress, however, we shall have to bring into our fold the three radical groups in the country—the youths, the workers and the peasants—and give them adequate representation. This will be possible only when the present constitution of the Congress which is based on the British model is radically changed.

"One of our immediate tasks, therefore, is to organise branches of the party all over the country and to agitate for a radical change of the present Congress constitution. Only when this is done, will the Congress adopt a radical programme and plan of action on the lines that we now contemplate.

"It is necessary for us in India to distinguish clearly once for all between our internal policy and our external policy.

"In the domain of our external policy, our own socio-political views or predilections should not prejudice us against people or nations holding different views, whose sympathy we may nevertheless be able to acquire.

"This is a universal cardinal principle in external policy and it is because of this principle that to-day in Europe a pact between Soviet Russia and Fascist Italy is not only a possibility but an accomplished fact. Therefore in our external policy we should heartily respond to any sympathy for India which we may find in any part of the world.

"In determining our internal policy, it would be a fatal error to say that the choice for India lies between Communism and Fascism. No standpoint or theory can be the last word in human wisdom. The socio-political theories and institutions of the modern nations are the product of their history, environment and needs. They are liable to change and development just as human life is.

"Moreover, it should be remembered that some of the most interesting institutions of the present day are still experiments. Time must elapse before they could be declared to be successful and in the meantime we should not mortgage our intellect anywhere.

"My own view has always been that India's task is to work out a synthesis of all that is useful and good in the different movements that we see to-day. For this purpose we shall have to study with critical sympathy all the movements and experiments that are going on in Europe and America. We should be guilty of folly if we ignore any movement or experiment because of any preconceived bias or predilection."

Referring to "certain statements made in the British Press and reproduced thereafter in the Indian newspapers," Mr. Bose said these may have led to some misunderstanding of his socio-political views.

"I maintain more strongly than ever," he said "while it is imperatively necessary that we should study all the modern movements abroad—especially the freedom movements in countries which regained their freedom within the last 100 years—it is equally necessary for us in India to chalk out the future lines of our progress in conformity with our past history, and our present and future requirements. The geographical and intellectual isolation which India has enjoyed for centuries should enable us to adopt a sympathetic but critical attitude towards other lands and nations."

THE BEER CONSPIRACY. (BY C. RAJAGOPALACHARI.)

Every observant temperance reformer must have observed the increased number of foreign liquor advertisements in the streets of our cities and wondered whether we could not get a legal prohibition, if not of the manufacture and sale of liquor, at least of advertisements, seeking to get the drinking habit instilled into men that do not at present know the taste of beer or strong spirits.

Mr. Issac Foot, M.P., has recently written to the press exposing a conspiracy hatched by the Director of the Brewers' Society of England. He has written an open letter drawing public attention to a speech made by Sir Edward Sanders at a meeting of the Wholesale Brewers' Association of Birmingham and Midland Counties, copy of which was marked "Private and Confidential" and circulated to Brewers for action. The following extracts from the circular of the Director of the Brewers' Society speak for themselves:—

"The Chief Customers of the public house today are the elderly and middle-aged men. Unless you can attract the younger generation to take the place of the older men, there is no doubt we shall have to face a steadily falling consumption. I am not saying that the present beer drinker should drink more, but rather that we want new customers. We want to get the beer-drinking habit instilled into thousands, almost millions of youngmen, who do not at present know the taste of beer.

"The main lines would be press advertising, bill posting, advertising on public vehicles, possibly by illuminated signs, distribution of literature, lectures and articles by prominent persons and press propaganda by means of editorial and news items.

If we begin advertising in the press, we shall see that the continuation of our advertising is contingent upon the fact that we get editorial support as well in the same papers. In that way it is wonderful how you can educate public opinion, generally without making it too obvious that there is a publicity campaign behind it all.

"There are plenty of footballers, plenty of cricketers etc., who would like to appear in the press saying that their strength is derived from beer—at any rate, we should consider it in connection with our scheme."

These extracts must be a sufficient warning to youth, newspaper readers and public bodies that control spaces for advertisements in public places until such time as we can induce legislatures to prohibit this kind of solicitation for the consumption of alcoholic liquors.

MODERN GERMANY.

Doctor Richter, the German Consul, was subjected to a volley of questions and criticism of Her Hitler's policy, when he addressed the members of the Muslim University Union on the present conditions in Germany.

After a tribute to the buildings and especially the laboratories of the Muslim University, he observed that though Germany was so far off from India, cordial relations had always existed between the two great countries. German Scholars and Scientists had always been interested in Indian culture and Islam.

The man in the street, he said, had to depend for news about Germany on the exaggerated and sometimes incorrect accounts published in newspapers. The intelligentsia, however, has to study things more thoroughly. The German situation was a result of the war. The economic, social political condition had combined to create a new State in Germany. In November, 1918, he said, Germany had suffered a terrible collapse and lost everything—wealth, power and Government.

The Social Democratic Government was neither Socialistic nor Liberal. The Marxists with their materialistic outlook were gaining ground and Germany was in danger of losing its idealistic outlook. The nation was split up into dozens of parties each pursuing its own selfish course. There was a feeling of uneasiness and unrest among the nationalists, especially the students and the youth. The unemployed figure had reached to six millions.

Meanwhile, the National-Socialist movement was making a steady headway. It was not right to say that the Nazis had captured power by violence or unconstitutional means. Their party has outgrown the other parties and secured an overwhelming majority in the General Hitler election as the acknowledged leader of the majority party was appointed Chancellor by President Hindenburg. He was thus empowered to carry on the reforms, very much desired by the German youth. It was not right to say they were ruled by a minority.

National-Socialism, he said, considered the nation as the highest form of human development. Mankind is a higher ideal but the best way of serving mankind was to serve one's own nation. The nation was entitled to demand any sacrifice from its citizens. They were trying to awaken in their youths strong patriotic spirit, but it was not right to suggest they were teaching them militarism. It was one of Hitler's foremost aims "to win back the nation for the German workman" and to give him full rights.

Hitler, he continued, wanted peace to be able to carry out his policy of reform successfully. In the present unarmed state, with no aircraft, tanks or heavy artillery, they could not possibly want to wage war against heavily armed nations.

Referring to the Jewish problem he declared that they could not possibly tolerate Jews who were foreigners. Being only one per cent. in population, they had captured the entire Press, Civil Service and Business. Jews were compelled to leave Government Service.

An interesting discussion followed in which a number of students and professors participated. Doctor Kunwar Mohd. Ashraf said that Dr. Richter's justification for the treatment of the Jews in Germany was wholly unsatisfactory. He held that the German workers, in common with workers of the whole world, wanted bread, but what Herr Hitler offered them was a Swastika and a Nazi uniform. It was no solution of the problem to turn out Jews and to give their jobs to unemployed Christians. Mr. K. Ahmad Abbas supported Dr. Ashraf—National Cull.

Urdu script, I. Karamchand, Editor, the weekly "Paras" gave a very successful dinner party at his residence on Pattanchand Road, when about fifty prominent journalists and literary gentlemen were present. Pandit Pearay Mohan Dattatrya in discussing the possibility of the Urdu type visualised the day when Indian newspapers would receive even their telegrams in Hindustani. He thanked the Government of H.E.H. the Nizam for the great interest they had taken in this most interesting and important item in the development of the Urdu language and hoped that they would continue their interest to work it to a successful conclusion. The Pandit appreciated the success which the distinguished guest of the evening had attained in perfecting Urdu Nastalik type. Pandit Pearay Mohan was followed by Maulana Abdul Majid Salik and Maulana Tajwar, both of whom emphasised the importance of suitable Nastaliq type for the development of Urdu literature and journalism. The guest of the evening, Syed Abdul Karim Husaini gave details of the Nastaliq Type and referred to the intention of the Hyderabad Government to pursue their aim with full vigour. He described how in Hyderabad they were substituting Nastaliq type for litho Urdu printing. He stated that the Nizam's Government had decided to supply Nastaliq Urdu type at cost price to all purchasers.

A Holi Celebration in Lahore:—A dinner party was arranged by R. B. Lala Kanwar Sain, Bar-at-Law, ex-Chief Justice, High Court, Jammu and Kashmir, at his residence 43, Lower Mall, Lahore on the 2nd March to celebrate the auspicious Holi, writes a correspondent in the Tribune. About 60 of his friends and relations gathered to celebrate Holi and partake of the cordial hospitality of the Rai Bahadur. Each guest, as he came, was welcomed with scent, almonds, misri and of course with a little powdered colour. Right in the middle of some instrumental entertainment the Rai Bahadur who was not recognised by the guests came in dressed as an old Persian and conversed with the guests in his excellent Persian with a true Persian accent. The dinner was then served which was very sumptuous and was universally appreciated. After dinner a little more powdered colour was thrown about. The Hindu and Muslim guests participated in the activities with equal enthusiasm. The Rai Bahadur and his son gave some chorus songs. Songs were sung by some of the guests as well. After thanking their hosts for their hospitality the guests dispersed late at night.

Conversion and Married Status:—An interesting divorce petition, filed by the daughter of a Hindu Raja of North Bengal, came up for hearing before Justice A. K. Roy in the High Court of Calcutta. The petitioner, who embraced Islam in 1933 and assumed the name of Jawd Banu, said that after renouncing Hinduism she called upon her husband, Mr. M. C. Ghose, Bar-at-Law and some time Judge of the Small Causes Court, Calcutta, to do so. On his refusal to comply with that request she sought judicial separation as her conscience did not allow the continuance of marital relations with a man of a different faith.

Missionary Posters on Temple Walls:—Considerable adverse criticism of the action of missionary organization in placarding the Pilgrims' Trail up the side of Taishan, China's "sacred mountain," is appearing in the foreign-language newspapers in China. Several mission organizations, but particularly the Religious Tract Society of Hankow, a British mission, have had gaudy posters pasted upon the walls of temples and shrines on either side of the Pilgrims' Trail. Most of the posters depict sinners writhing in the devouring flames of hell and other "tortures of the damned." "It is hard to know which to admire the more, the boldness of the missionaries or the forbearance of the Chinese," says The North China Daily News of Shanghai. "One wonders what would happen if in England some Buddhist society placarded the walls of Canterbury Cathedral with Buddhist posters."

Women in Conference:—The fourth biennial Conference of the National Council of Women was held in Bombay on Tuesday and the two following days. The Maharani of Baroda, one of the pioneers and veteran workers of the Women's Movement in this country, presided. Her Highness in her address emphasised the need for a change in the outlook of Indian woman and the development by her of independence of thought and energetic action. It is not only Indian women but also Indian men who lack these qualities proving anew the great social axiom that the men everywhere are largely what their women make them. The Maharani's sketch of her ideal woman may stand word for word for the ideal man also. Indian religion has crystallised the idea that the perfect divine (and human) character is a combination of man and woman, in Ardhanareeswara, half man, half woman, sculptured in Elephanta and other shrines. It is in entire consonance with this concept that the Women's Movement in this country has resisted the attempts to make it a replica of the feminist movements of the West. Both Her Highness and Mrs. Sarojini Naidu who followed her insisted that the movement stood for co-operation with and was not in antagonism to men. As a step towards giving effect to the Maharani's exhortation to Indian women to develop active qualities, we would suggest that a short and stirring appeal be broadcasted adjuring girls and women to give up the depressing practice of committing suicide either by burning themselves or throwing themselves into a tank or well as a protest against ill-treatment by their husbands and their relatives. The number of such cases shows an alarming increase. The other day a Hindu judge in deciding a case of this type sadly remarked that this is the sort of thing which make Hindus hang their heads in shame. The Women's Conference may establish centres in the country to which aggrieved women may resort for shelter and advice in such cases. The mere fact that an institution of the kind exists in the vicinity will have a deterrent effect on men and women (for women are oftentimes more cruel to women than men). Her Highness referred to the cases of Princesses whose condition is in some cases worse than that of women in less exalted positions. In the case of the latter, there is at least the fear of being sent to jail, to check brutality. The women of royal families have not even this slight protection, and their isolation in zenanas puts them out of reach of public sympathy. We are now and again receiving publications, we received one last week, containing pitiful stories of women denied elementary rights, humiliated and even subjected to physical force. There is, no doubt, some exaggeration, perhaps a good deal. There is, however, reason to fear that there is more than a modicum of truth also in such allegations. We are unable to suggest any plan of action which will do good without doing infinitely greater harm to the victims. But women are more resourceful and the public declaration of the Maharani of Baroda that such cases exist, should send a ray of hope to the unfortunate women who suffer in the impenetrable darkness of the zenana.

Indian Representation in International Conferences:—A discussion which seemed likely to take a controversial turn was tactfully diverted to informal conversation at tea parties by the lady who occupied the Chair at the Women's Conference in the temporary absence of the Maharani of Baroda. Mrs. Hamid Ali remarked that India should be represented at International Women's Conferences by Indian women, which is a truism. It would seem that a majority of the delegates chosen has hitherto been non-Indian women. Mrs. Mackenzie explained that this was because Indian women who were willing to incur the trouble and expense of attending these conferences, have not been forthcoming. This statement was not accepted by Mrs. Hamid Ali. Indian women are not in the habit of inviting themselves to any function and, according to the prevailing practice, delegates are selected from among those who offer themselves to represent India. But surely the selection Committee or Council should see that those who represent India are Indians. There has been much trouble over Indian representation in International Conferences for which the choice of delegates rests with Government. It is now accepted that the majority at least should be natives of the country. International Conferences of women are not official bodies and now that exception has been taken to non-Indians being selected as representatives, we are sure there will be no further doubt in the matter. Any number of Indian women of education and standing can be found to attend Conferences at the remotest parts of the world nowadays. The representatives of other countries raise their eyebrows when an European lady announces herself as the representative of India which is supposed to be inhabited by brown and black people. No European is allowed to represent Indians in the Indian legislatures.

India and America:—Mr. Foley in the article which we print today concludes that there is a wide field of co-operation between America and India. Many of America's serious problems have their counterparts in this country. The United States it must be said, have let us down for the time being in regard to Prohibition. India had hoped for much from America's example. But we are glad that the idea that drinking is a sin, which is common to Islam and Hinduism, is now also the creed of many of the Christian Churches of America. Another encouraging fact is the keen interest taken by American Universities not only in the ancient culture but also in the current movements of this country. India needs to imbibe the energetic spirit of America. America, on the other hand, may learn from us the importance of occasionally sitting still. It was reported the other day from Kapurthala that, just before a viceregal function was to take place, a swarm of angry bees attacked two men. One, known as the Sandow of Kapurthala, showed fight and had to fly for his life. The other sat still and the bees acknowledged his wisdom by merely buzzing over his head and he escaped practically without injury.

Jews in Germany:—Following the arrest of an eminent Jewish industrialist in Germany by Nazi storm troopers and his ultimate rescue by the police who procured the imprisonment of the kidnappers for varying terms, a decree was issued forbidding arbitrary action by Nazis without official sanction. The decree gives a certain measure of security to the Jews although they still remain there on sufferance. Herr Hitler has at the same time issued an order enforcing the Aryan clause in the army and the diplomatic service. Mr. Cohen-Portheim in "The Discovery of Europe" writes of the position of German Jews under the Empire. "The grandsons or great-grandsons were no longer satisfied with what had satisfied their parents They found it irksome to be Jewish. Jews could not become officers or diplomats but to the baptised all careers were open; so they were baptised and with that passed out to pastures new..... To the vast disgust of the old nobility there were even ambassadors chosen from among these." As the Aryan clause of the Hitler regime makes the issue racial rather than religious, several who were accepted as true Germans under the old regime will be thrown out for the Jewish blood inherited from some ancestor.

The Austrian Tangle:—Mr. Bertram Pickard writes from Geneva, "I shall always remember the tense atmosphere in the League Council Room when some three years ago the question of the proposed Customs Union between Austria and Germany was discussed. I recall with particular vividness the pale face and trembling hands of Dr. Benes, the able Foreign Minister of Czechoslovakia as he spoke earnest words of warning to the effect that anything approaching Austro-German Union (the Anschluss it is often called) would mean war. You have only to look at the map of Central Europe to realise what the Anschluss means to Czechoslovakia. The Anschluss would leave her surrounded on three sides—a virtual prisoner, politically and economically. Anyone who has been to Prague, or who knows anything about the heroic conquest of independence by the Czechs under the leadership of Masaryk and Benes cannot fail to feel keen sympathy for this go-ahead and enlightened Republic. At the same time Masaryk and Benes must bear their share of the blame for the grave error made by the framers of the Peace Treaties after the war, when they left a truncated Austria as an independent State under conditions that made her dependence inevitable. It is true that the League has brilliantly saved Austria from chaos more than once, but these measures could, in the nature of the case be only palliative. Austria has been and still is, more or less a pawn in the diplomatic struggles of the Great Powers—Germany, Italy and France. German policy is plain. Hitler is determined to Nazify Austria, though her nominal independence would be maintained, for a time at least, to preserve the letter of treaties. The eventual victory of National Socialism is widely prophesied. Italian policy is equally plain. Italy fears an extension of the Third Reich southward to the borders of such Tyrol, and is obviously giving strong support to the Dollfuss Government and particularly to the Fascist—like Heimwehr. The signs at present point to a rapprochement between Austria and Hungary under Italian leadership as a barrier to Nazi control in Austria. The French position is less clear. No doubt France would resist the Anschluss with all her force, but it is not certain that she would intervene to prevent the victory of the Austrian Nazis, and still more doubtful whether she would oppose with real energy the policy of Italy. The ideal solution would have been a Danubian Confederation englobing the Little Entente together with Austria and Hungary. If France and England had really been disinterestedly concerned about Central European peace and prosperity they could have done much in past years. Even now it might not be too late, if courageous action were taken by the League Council."

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER BOMBAY, MARCH 17, 1934.

THE BENGAL-BOMBAY FEUD.

The Indian budget has fanned into a blaze the long smouldering embers of the antagonism which has been growing between Bombay and Bengal for some years past. The origin of the antagonism dates back to the anti-Partition days. Bengal in her determination to resist the Partition which Lord Curzon had effected, decided upon a boycott of British goods. She placed her orders for piecegoods with the Bombay mills and it is admitted that the latter utilised the opportunity to make money by means some of which will not bear scrutiny. This did not imply hostility to Bengal. The same thing happened in Bombay. Last year one heard of dealers of "swadeshi" goods who imported large stocks of Japanese cloth, put the swadeshi stamp on it and sold it as "swadeshi," and made huge profits some portion of which they donated to national movements. Many people knew of it in Bombay but they merely smiled and kept quiet, or remarked such things could not be helped. The Bengalis are not business men and they were bitterly disappointed that the Bombay merchants did not play the game in the same spirit as themselves. The incident has been rankling in their minds ever since. Gokhale had great faith in Bengal. He used to say that what Bengal thought today the whole think tomorrow. There was good ground for his opinion. No people in India has such a passion for ideas and is so ready to sacrifice everything for an ideal as the Bengalis. It is this idealism which made Bengal the leader of India in religious, social and political reform since the days of Raja Ram Mahan Roy. The Raja was followed by Keshab Chunder Sen, Devendranath Tagore, Ishwar Chandra Vidyasagar, Ramkrishna Paramahansa, Vivekananda. In the political field, Bengal produced Surendranath Banerjee, Lal Mohan Ghose, Kali Charan Banerji, Man Mohan Ghose, Rash Behari Ghose, Lord Sinha. In Science, she has given Sir J. C. Bose, Sir P. C. Ray, Sir C. V. Raman; in Philosophy Sir S. Radhakrishnan and Das Gupta; in Education, Gurusdas Banerjee and Sir Asutosh Mukherji; in journalism, Motilal Ghose and Bepin Chunder Pal. The Poet Tagore and the mystic Arambinda Ghose stand apart by themselves. Bengali boys and girls have sacrificed liberty and life in the sadly perverse belief that they would thereby accelerate the advent of India's freedom.

Bengal's influence in the country was great because of such men and such achievements. Bombay leaders like Dadabhai Naoroji, Ranade, Pherozeshah Mehta, and Gokhale appreciated her idealism and held Bengal in high regard. The great Muslim leader, Sir Syed Ahmed, held Bengal in high admiration. The Aga Khan the other day spoke of Bengal as the premier province of India—a compliment which has touched the sensitive Bengali heart. In Bombay since the days of the late Lord Sydenham who, indeed, instigated the movement, political leadership has steadily passed out of the hands of people versed in the science of Politics, into those of financier and "business men" to whom ideals mean very little. These classes are always more amenable to compromise and it was thought that they would give less trouble than politicians. They have been led into a trap. The depressed condition of Bombay is not due to Bengal. Neither is it due to the Kathiawar States, the second scape-goat on which anathemas are rained. The opening of the Cochin and Vizagapatam harbours will certainly take away a large slice of Bombay trade, much larger perhaps than Bhavnagar and Jamnagar. There has been no outcry against the opening of the two great ports in the flanks of Bombay. Every State is entitled to develop, to the utmost, its resources in the interests of its citizens. The outcry against the Kathiawar States, that they are stealing away Bombay's business, is incapable of justification on any political principle. To return to Bengal. The assignment of one half of the export duty on jute, which is grown only in Bengal, is no grievance to Bombay as some of her leading business men have been led to think. Bombay has a real grievance in regard to the income-tax collected by the Indian Government within its borders, without allowing it any part or it. Bengal would support Bombay's demand for a moiety of the income tax. Instead of urging this legitimate claim, Bombay has become embroiled in a bitter controversy with a sister province, which threatens to destroy irretrievably good feeling among the provinces. For the quarrel is already extended beyond the two principal belligerents. It is high time that far-seeing leaders—there are still some—on both sides intervened to restore peace and goodwill between Bombay and Bengal.

CONVERSION AND CHRISTIAN COLLEGES

Our protest against the participation of the members of the British Cabinet, the Secretary of State for India, and the Viceroy in the appeal for funds to strengthen some Christian Colleges in this country, as a violation of the principle of religious neutrality, has been represented by the Guardian of Madras as an attack on the existence of these colleges. We cannot trace any justification for this misapprehension in our leading article on which the Guardian bases its criticism. We should like to make it perfectly clear that our objection is not to the existence of these or any other colleges. At the moment, we are not even raising the question whether it is consistent with the principle of religious neutrality to make grants from revenues largely contributed by non-Christians to institutions whose aim is to pervert Hindu and Muslim students from their ancestral faiths. Our immediate objection is to the impropriety of the Head of the Government in India and His Majesty's Ministers in Britain publicly associating themselves with an appeal for funds to equip the mind of India against traditional influences (p. 148, the Lindsay Commission's Report). No one who peruses the Lindsay Commission's Report can deny that in the opinion of the Commission the fundamental purpose of Christian Colleges is to supplant the Indian religions. Sentence after sentence can be quoted in proof of this. The Commission was fully within its rights in taking up this position. It is the association with it of those responsible for the conduct of the Government of India, in accordance with the principle of religious neutrality guaranteed by Proclamation and statute, to which we take exception. The Guardian contends that this objection is tantamount to a complete ban on men (we are concerned only with men holding official positions) of any creed associating themselves in any manner with a body which has as its object the preaching of one's faith to others. This may be absurd in the eyes of the Guardian but it is the declared policy of British rule and every one who holds an official position in it is bound to abide by it apart from its reason or unreason.* The Guardian goes on to summarise the recommendations of the Lindsay Commission omitting, inadvertently, the central purpose of those recommendations, as Lord Lothian did in his speech at the Mansion House on which we commented last week. The Guardian is not sure whether or not conversion is an object of Christian Colleges. It observes: "Whether the Colleges are out for conversions is an open question even among the authorities of the colleges." The Lindsay Commission had no doubt on the point. It noted that the total number of baptisms from all these colleges during the last ten years would not be more, if as many as, a dozen. But note what follows: "That is so in spite of an earnest longing for such results on the part of the Christian teachers and much distress at the apparent lack of success of their earnest efforts." The Guardian adds: "Our contemporary knows that it has no reason to be scared on the point." Not in the least. Even if every student who attends a Mission college is converted, there would be nothing for us to be scared about. We are concerned solely with the question of principle. Every deviation from principle today constitutes a precedent for tomorrow and this is a deviation which we should not like to see repeated—nor, we are sure, the Guardian—in self-governing India. If it be frankly stated that the Christian institutions stand out of the proselytising purpose of Christian Missions, and that they are not antagonistic to non-Christian faiths, we should hail the declaration as a big step towards the better understanding between the great religious faiths. The Indian Witness, the organ of Methodist missions in Upper India does this. It writes: "But do the Christian Colleges exist for the purpose of turning the people of India from their ancestral faiths? We insist that they do not. Christian missions in their most positive evangelistic efforts do not aim at turning anyone from this ancestral faith. Certainly such a programme would be opposed to the whole spirit and teaching of Jesus." This is the view of the Hocking Commission. This, however, is not the view of the Lindsay Commission whose recommendations form the basis of the appeal for funds made at the Mansion House.

The Guardian's argument may be briefly put thus: "These Colleges have been the means of educating many hundreds, perhaps, thousands of non-Christian students. They have been the means of bringing to this country several educational Missionaries of high purpose who have showed India that there is a non-predatory side to Western civilization. The Re-

* "Firmly relying ourselves on the truth of Christianity, and acknowledging the solace of religion, we disclaim alike the right and the desire to impose our convictions on any of our subjects. We declare it to be our royal will and pleasure that none be in any wise favoured, none molested or distinguished by reason of their religious faith or observances.....and we do strictly charge and enjoin all those who may be in authority under us that they abstain from all interference with the religious belief or worship of any of our subjects on pain of our highest displeasure." Queen's Proclamation, 1858.

former knows that practically no conversions have taken place and that there is still less likelihood of any occurring in the future. Then, why make all this fuss about the participation of the Viceroy and Cabinet Ministers in an appeal for funds to provide better buildings and equipment for the Colleges?" The worldly wisdom of this advice, we appreciate. But somehow it does not seem to us that the issue is one in which worldly wisdom should be the primary consideration. The relations between East and West should be placed on truth, justice and love. They have subsisted too long on make-believes.

TRAVANCORE MAHARAJA'S EUROPEAN TOUR.

(FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT.)

The Report on the administration of Travancore for the Malabar year 1108 (August 1932 to August 1933) contains a detailed account of the European tour of His Highness the Maharaja.

"The most memorable event of the year under report was His Highness the Maharaja's European Tour." "It was," says the officiating Dewan Rao Saheb Dr. N. Kunjan Pillai, "a unique occasion in the history of the State, as His Highness was the first ruler of Travancore to cross the sea. His Highness the Maharaja accompanied by her Highness the Junior Maharani, the Elaya Raja and the First Princess left Trivandrum on the 27th March." The party sailed from Bombay on the 8th April, 1932. En route the Royal party visited Aden and Port Said and landed at Marseilles on the 21st. After spending a couple of days they left for Nice where a week was spent in visiting Cannes Grasse, Manao and Monte Carlo. They then did the continent, Vienna via Milan and Venice; the Austrian capital indeed was a great attraction and after spending 17 days there during which His Highness was honoured by the President of the Austrian Republic and the British Ambassador, the party moved to Karlsbad and then on to Marienbad and Prague. Paris was reached on the 9th June. His Highness and party were entertained at lunch by H. H. The Gaekwar of Baroda and H. H. The Maharaja of Kapurthala. After 5 days' stay His Highness arrived in London on the 14th June. The three weeks' stay in London was crowded with social engagements and His Highness made the acquaintance of several distinguished persons as the visit coincided with the session of the Joint Parliamentary Committee on Indian Reforms and the World Economic Conference. His Highness, Her Highness and the First Princess had the honour of being entertained at lunch by Their Majesties the King Emperor and Queen Empress at Ascot. Leaving London on the 5th July, Their Highnesses and party went to Brussels and reached Berlin on the 7th July. A very instructive tour to various places of interest having been made, Their Highnesses passed on to Italy which was reached on the 2nd August. At Rome His Highness visited His Holiness the Pope at the Vatican. A couple of days at Naples and on the 12th August Their Highnesses left Brindisi arriving in Bombay on the 24th August. About four and a half months was taken for this tour. In concluding the account of this tour, the officiating Dewan says:—"In this European tour His Highness the Maharaja was accompanied, besides the members of His Highness's family, by a very modest suite which consisted of a Private Secretary and Tour Agent, an A.D.C., the tutor to the Elaya Raja, one valet and one cook. This circumstance as well as the fact that Their Highnesses were all along taking only their own food and wearing only their Indian costumes, were specially noticed and highly commended by all the pressmen and publicists who came in contact with Their Highnesses."

THE PROBLEM OF PEACE.

The World War of 1914-18 and the peace which followed its conclusion has achieved one thing. It has forcibly drawn world attention to the need for a constructive peace—a peace which will be something more inspiring and beneficial to humanity than the present 'breathing space between wars.' Thus, in spite of the economic nationalism which has so dismayed Europe in recent years, it is increasingly felt that a war of armaments would be suicidal and a war of tariffs disastrous to civilisation. An even healthier development is the realisation that this task of ending war has been left too long in the hands of experts. And best of all is the recognition by experts themselves that if they are to progress at all they must get the general public behind them. An effort in the direction of educating the public is made by the eight writers who have contributed to "The Intelligent Man's Way to Prevent War", (Messrs Victor Gollancz, London: Price 5sh.). Mr. Leonard Woolf who, as the editor, contributes an introduction to the book, points out the divergent views on peace that have been collected between its covers and commends the publication as a protest, or rather as so many protests, against the barbarism of the period. Viscount Cecil and Mr. W. Arnold-Forster are apologists for the League of Nations and believe that progress can be achieved best through the League organisation. Sir Norman Angell, Sir Gilbert Murray and Mr. Charles Roden Buxton regard the League as defective but are convinced that it can be reformed to suit the necessities of the time. Professor Laski and Mr. C. M. Lloyd are as sincerely of the view that only in a Socialist world can peace be a reality. It is no doubt a remarkable feat to have gathered such different views on the subject of peace in one volume. But it is confusing to the "intelligent man."

Lord Cecil in his Chapter on the League of Nations deplors that during "the tenure of office of this Government (the National Government in Britain), and largely owing to its attitude, the League has declined in influence more than under any Government since the War." He asks the "intelligent man" to study the League technique and its achievements. Finally he concludes with the remark that the advantages of peaceful co-operation are the best arguments for the prevention of war and suggests that if the Governments resolve to withhold them from a violator of a minimum code of peace few countries will assume the offensive. Japan's policy in Manchuria shows the "intelligent man" how far we are from the ideal. Lord Cecil analyses the work of the League in the field of maintaining order between bellicose nations. He points to the settlements arrived at through League intervention in disputes between minor nation-members of the League. He explains that in one of its failures, when "Great Britain sent reinforcements to, and just outside of, the International Settlement at Shanghai," the League was "not used". He, however, reassures his reader that this action was not resisted by China and was confined strictly to what was necessary to protect British lives and property. The Chinese view would probably be different. Mr. Arnold-Forster figures even more prominently as Britain's apologist when he writes of the enormous sixteen-inch calibre guns allowed as "Coast Defence Guns" under the British Draft Convention. "The best way," he declares, "to get over the difficulty would, of course, be to get rid of the very big guns on the warships which the coastal defence guns are meant to reply to. But it seems that we can not hope for that yet, largely owing to Britain's insistence on the replenishment of great capital ships. Failing this, the best expedient, though manifestly unsatisfactory, would presumably be a limitation of the number of the coastal guns thus permitted and any technical measure that may be possible to render their mobility more difficult." Notwithstanding the fact that as a Briton it should be more possible for Mr. Arnold-Forster to influence his government to adopt a more reasonable outlook, he prefers, or finds it easier, to use the League to induce other nations to reduce their "coastal defence guns". This is all the more interesting in view of his earlier admonition to his reader, the "intelligent man", to give up old style notions of security whose advocates held that "my country as guardian of the peace should be free to arm according to its conception of the requirements of its own 'security'." We agree with Mr. Arnold-Forster that the worst of all disservices to disarmament would be to become defeatist at this juncture but surely his attitude here reveals that very quality.

The three chapters on Russia, Inter-continental Peace and Economic Foundations of Peace are closely connected. Mr. Roden Buxton finds European supremacy in Asia and Africa a grave menace to peace and suggests an early adoption of the League principle of Mandates by Imperialistic countries as a solution of the problem. The main advantage of such a system would lie in the opportunity afforded the League of pacifying German sentiments now smarting under the loss of her colonies. It is inconceivable that in doling out the mandates the League will ignore Germany who stands to regain her lost colonies. The open door policy prevalent in "mandated territory" will also ease the economic competition which has made the war of tariffs even more disastrous than the armaments war. Mr. Lloyd urges that the Russian Government has not only no intention of entering on war with another nation but has in the past strained every nerve to avoid conflict. A League of Nations without Russia, he maintains, would inevitably be feeble. The failure of the Soviet regime would bring not peace but chaos, wars of intervention and civil war. Mr. Lloyd is hopeful of the possibility of fitting Soviet Russia into a League of Socialist States. "In such a League," he writes, "though peace would not be automatically assured, the triple problem of security, arbitration and disarmament would at least be soluble. In the present dispensation the prospects of solving it are about as good as those of a flight to the moon." As the prospect of all the sixty odd states of the world going Socialist—unless the form is National-Socialism—is even remoter, we may take it that Mr. Lloyd has no hopes of achieving peace in the world for a long time to come. If Mr. Lloyd is pessimistic, Mr. Laski throws the intelligent man into the depths of despair by declaring that war is the inevitable result of the capitalistic system. Incidentally, Mr. Laski has an interesting sub-section on the incompatibility of democratic ideals and imperialism. "The preservation of conquests," he writes, "requires continuity of policy in foreign and imperial spheres; these cease in increasing degree to be the objects of popular control. This in turn develops an impatience with democracy in the domestic sphere." Equality is, as Mr. Laski asserts, the foundation of peace. Equality among nations is, like the Dominion Status promised to India, only a goal today. The objection which Sir Frederick White expressed on behalf of Britain, to America's granting independence to the Philippines, as recently reported in a local newspaper, shows present-day reactions to a liberal policy in a colonial affairs. The demand for independence on the part of subject nations is one but the voices of dependencies are divided. The imperialist states have a common problem and in the twentieth century they pursue a common policy. The danger that the League of Nations will degenerate into an instrument of that policy is a real one and Professor Laski's insistence on the abandonment of imperialism is a just one.

The entire book is based on the argument that it is possible to persuade the sovereign states to surrender their absolute powers to a kind of super-state. It is not an easy task to accomplish this and to an unbiased onlooker it would seem that the League had given up the idea early in its career. Far easier would it be to get the Great Powers to pool their resources together for maintenance of peace, though the menace to smaller states would be great. This unity had almost been achieved, but Japan broke away from the League, to be followed by Germany a few months later. "The Intelligent Man's Way" was published before Germany actually walked out of the Geneva councils though the probability of the event was great even then. The two nations naturally have attracted the attention of pacifists as dissentients, and measures to secure the prodigal's return occupy the speculations of more than one writer in this book.

The real value of this publication lies in the fact that it stimulates thought on the subject of peace. It is generally felt to-day that the League of Nations has not yet achieved a perfect technique of international diplomacy. The Manchurian crisis revealed the weakness of the League. It has been argued in this book that if a less militaristic government had been in power in Japan or if Britain and the other powers at the Geneva had taken a more definite stand on the principle involved, the result would have been different. Mr. Raymond L. Buell wrote a year ago that had Japan employed more skillful diplomacy she would probably have succeeded in securing the support of the League for its Manchurian policy. The fact remains, however, that the Manchurian incident has shaken public confidence in the League. In the sphere of health and social welfare, the policy of international co-operation initiated by the League has borne fruit. In political and economic affairs the League has not progressed very far. With the United States of America, Soviet Russia, Germany and Japan outside the League, its influence is considerably weakened. If the divisive influences which are to-day so predominant in Europe continue to preponderate, we shall soon have a League of Nations coterminous with the British Empire. As matters stand at present, it is difficult to conceive of a League of Nations which can really legislate and enforce its legislation in international affairs. The peace machinery must provide methods other than war for effecting political change. If it does not, it becomes a mere machine for preserving the status quo.

The Gayatri:—Dr. Samuel Bickersteth, Chaplain to the King, writes of his 40 years recollections in the C. E. Newspaper. Dr. Bickersteth writes:—Are men wrong who feel unable to join exclusively any school of thought, but who continue to go on trying to learn from all of them? From my earliest days I recollect my father's invariable habit of reading aloud at the breakfast table the poem for that Sunday from Keble's Christian Year. At Oxford, my father-in-law, Sir M. Monier-Williams, Professor of Sanscrit, profoundly learned in his own subject, the lexicographer of Sanscrit, a life-long student of Hinduism, Zoroastrianism, and up to a ripe old age a deeply-convinced Christian believer, told me that he started his day's work by using the Gayatri prayer, but with a deeper meaning than the millions of Hindus, who use it daily, have yet seen in the words: "Let us meditate on that excellent glory of the Divine Vivifying Sun; may he enlighten our understandings."

AMERICA WAITS.

Though the United States is in the midst of the greatest crisis since the Civil War, in a very deep sense of the word we are waiting—almost with bated breath. For years we have watched the crumbling of Europe. Now we can see nothing ahead for that section of the globe except another war of some variety. We know that the nationalism of Europe has created a most pitiable condition. We know that so long as Europe is split up into human fragments that exhibit only hate toward each other there can be no peace. We know that the World War did not end in 1918. We know that Europe has not turned, and does not intend to turn, the corner to peace. We have almost come to the place where we feel it might be a good thing for Germany to "gobble up" Austria—and other smaller countries as well—perhaps some of the larger ones, too. For we have a rather deep-seated conviction that the people who compose the countries will have the most to say in the end as to the form of government. If those disastrous walls can be destroyed that now separate nations it may be possible for men and women to begin to live together in some sort of harmony.

But we do not know. We do not know. We are afraid that a nationalistic madness is abroad that will bring death and destruction to men and their homes. It is almost more than we can hope for that literally centuries of hatred can be turned to friendliness over night. And yet we know that is all that will give Europe peace in our time.

We find it difficult to say whether the United States should have joined the League of Nations or not. The documents supporting that organisation seem, in the light of these last few years, to have created far more problems than they will ever solve. Yet we know that all the countries of the West are bound inseparably together. Some kind of union must be effected ultimately. It may be that America, never having had to learn the long hard lessons of self-sacrifice that India, for instance, has learned most successfully, is not capable yet of being a part of a greater union. Many of our friends still believe that the United States can stand alone while much of the rest of the world goes down to physical and social defeat. However some of us cannot be that blind. We believe in a union that shall transcend national barriers. But nothing has driven us as yet to believe in a union of force, which is the basis of the present League of Nations.

So we find ourselves waiting. So long have we been doing this that we are almost in an attitude of resignation. The hangman seems to be ready to fix the noose about the neck of Europe. How to prevent the catastrophe we do not know. We are observant spectators—somewhat against our will. For we do not like to look backward. We have been heading westward since the founding of this country. There is a kind of resentment that twenty years ago our attention was wrenched eastward toward what are known colloquially as "the old countries." We are not altogether sure that we would like to stop the hangman. But we are fundamentally uncertain as to what will actually happen to us when Europe is hanged.

But we find ourselves waiting for something else to happen. This rather puzzles us. For we have no personal quarrel with Japan. Or we think we haven't. Now Japan is openly challenging us in most belligerent fashion. Perhaps we have not been over diplomatic about our recognition of the U. S. S. R. But we had got to the place where we realized how silly we were in our attitude toward that country. So without thinking too much of the diplomacy concerned we resumed relations with a neighbour in the world of nations. Of course, we had a general idea that probably our being on friendly terms with the U. S. S. R. might give Japan pause in her fairly evident attempt to annex Siberia. But we knew that Japan had continued her widespread activities although England was on good terms with the U. S. S. R. We did have a suspicion that some country or countries in Europe held Japan in high esteem. You see, even when we faced East, as we have for many years, we found it impossible to ignore altogether certain complications in Europe. So we are waiting for Japan and the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics to begin hostilities.

Superficially, Japan is trying to complete her air defence of Tokio and the U. S. S. R. is trying to double track the last thousand miles of her Siberian Railway as it reaches out toward Vladivostok. Which will win in this outward game we do not know! Undoubtedly there are other subterranean moves being made that will appear on the pages of some history a hundred years from now. In the meantime we are waiting. And, believe me, it is no easy job. But we are trying to be intelligent observers.

We are waiting and hoping that somehow India will keep to her usual course that she has maintained for thousands of years. We know that India has not sought other people's territories, or oil fields, or coal and iron deposits. But we are rather afraid that Japan's increasing trade with India indicates something more than a genuine interest in India's welfare. But India has so many of the elements that will compose all the nations in the new world that will arise out of the old that we hope she may retain her identity. India has patience and longevity. She has deep human understanding. She has the quality of keeping still and knowing that life is capable of being observed century after century. She has the quality of forever seeking after what has thus far seemed the unattainable—yet which she knows some day will be attained. The search after Truth has always challenged not only India's great son, Gandhi, but also India's whole civilization.

We are hoping that something of great significance will come out of the combination of America waiting and India seeking. We remember in these moments that "they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength" and that "they also serve who only stand and wait." Also we know it was said one time by a great personality, "Seek and ye shall find." May our hands be joined in a magnificent task.

Some Interesting Figures:—According to figures prepared and published in the Natal Mercury the total number of original Indian immigrants remaining in Natal at December 31 is 81,101. It is interesting to note that of these Indians only 4,938 are younger than 40. There are 2,489 men and 1,528 women between 41 and 45; 4,897 men and 2,142 women between 46 and 50; 8,881 men and 1,764 women between 51 and 55; 2,985 men and 1,616 women between 56 and 60; and 3,120 men and 1,794 women between 61 and 90. It is obvious, therefore, that the remaining indentured Indians will grow rapidly less in number through death alone. Over 13,000 have returned to India under the repatriation and assisted emigration schemes, and it is believed that when the last of the indentured Indians have died or returned to India the stream of returning Indians will practically cease. It was estimated in 1931 that there were 163,400 Indians in Natal, so that it will be seen that about 80 per cent. of them are South African-born. There are 6,511 Indians in the Cape, 15,500 in the Transvaal and only 100 in the Free State.—Indian Opinion.

GOVERNMENT BY THE MAJORITY— DEMOCRACY.

(BY MRS. I. J. PITT.)

In view of the fact that some form of democratic government suited to Indian conditions will be inaugurated in the near future, some remarks on the democratic system may not be out of place.

A right understanding of how this system works is very necessary in India at present, because in accordance with this system a momentous transference of responsibility and power into India's hands will be carried through.

Will it not be right to surmise that the following thoughts are in the minds of many Indian politicians?

1st. Distrust—because it appears as if the Government had changed its liberal policy, and was yielding to the outcries of the "Die-Hards".

2nd. Resentment—because whenever any Government pronouncement is made that is favourable and just to India, some opposition is sure to spring up, trying to discredit it, as in the case of Lord Willingdon's last Viceregal speech which Lord Salisbury sought to discredit.

3rd. Deep disappointment—They say—what is the use of all these R. T. Conferences, Joint Select Committees and discussions when the result is a scheme which is more or less dissatisfying to everyone. "We asked for bread and you have given us a stone."

These depressing thoughts are very natural and indeed inevitable to those who have not had the experience of living under a Democratic System, or who take a shallow view, and who do not understand how its machinery works.

To the well informed democrat the above facts indicated under numbers, 1, 2, 3, would give no rise to distrust, resentment or disappointment, because to take the three points in question one by one—

1st. Distrust, from seeming change of policy. The National Government has not changed its policy, as it could not do so. A Party comes into power on its affirmation of a certain policy on all questions with which it will have to deal. So long as it is in power it must keep to that same policy. A change of policy will not occur until the said Party goes out of power. As there are no signs of the National Government going out of Power in the near future, we may be sure of the same policy until then.

2nd. Resentment with the Opposition. The Opposition is a necessary part of the Democratic system. It is the business of the Opposition to oppose. The more important the Bill to be passed through Parliament the more deep the feeling about it will be, and therefore, the more violent will be the opposition.

The immense importance of the India Bill can be gauged by the violence of the Opposition.

But we need not be disturbed by this so long as the Opposition is not strong enough to cause a vote of censure against the party in power, which would have to be followed by a General Election, and the Opposition coming into power. There are no signs so far of such an eventuality.

Consequently when Opposition springs up discrediting Government, we expect it, and look upon it as nothing but "Parliamentary Procedure."

3rd. Disappointment with the White Paper Scheme which satisfies no one. This disappointment would not have prevailed if close attention had been paid to the pronouncements of Government. Sir Samuel Hoare repeatedly warned India that no one could

But we find ourselves waiting for something else to happen. This rather puzzles us. For we have no personal quarrel with Japan. Or we think we haven't. Now Japan is openly challenging us in most belligerent fashion. Perhaps we have not been over diplomatic about our recognition of the U. S. S. R. But we had got to the place where we realized how silly we were in our attitude toward that country. So without thinking too much of the diplomacy concerned we resumed relations with a neighbour in the world of nations. Of course, we had a general idea that probably our being on friendly terms with the U. S. S. R. might give Japan pause in her fairly evident attempt to annex Siberia. But we knew that Japan had continued her widespread activities although England was on good terms with the U. S. S. R. We did have a suspicion that some country or countries in Europe held Japan in high esteem. You see, even when we faced East, as we have for many years, we found it impossible to ignore altogether certain complications in Europe. So we are waiting for Japan and the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics to begin hostilities.

Superficially, Japan is trying to complete her air defence of Tokio and the U. S. S. R. is trying to double track the last thousand miles of her Siberian Railway as it reaches out toward Vladivostok. Which will win in this outward game we do not know! Undoubtedly there are other subterranean moves being made that will appear on the pages of some history a hundred years from now. In the meantime we are waiting. And, believe me, it is no easy job. But we are trying to be intelligent observers.

We are waiting and hoping that somehow India will keep to her usual course that she has maintained for thousands of years. We know that India has not sought other people's territories, or oil fields, or coal and iron deposits. But we are rather afraid that Japan's increasing trade with India indicates something more than a genuine interest in India's welfare. But India has so many of the elements that will compose all the nations in the new world that will arise out of the old that we hope she may retain her identity. India has patience and longevity. She has deep human understanding. She has the quality of keeping still and knowing that life is capable of being observed century after century. She has the quality of forever seeking after what has thus far seemed the unattainable—yet which she knows some day will be attained. The search after Truth has always challenged not only India's great son, Gandhi, but also India's whole civilization.

We are hoping that something of great significance will come out of the combination of America waiting and India seeking. We remember in these moments that "they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength" and that "they also serve who only stand and wait." Also we know it was said one time by a great personality, "Seek and ye shall find." May our hands be joined in a magnificent task.

Some Interesting Figures:—According to figures prepared and published in the Natal Mercury the total number of original Indian immigrants remaining in Natal at December 31 is 81,101. It is interesting to note that of these Indians only 4,938 are younger than 40. There are 2,489 men and 1,528 women between 41 and 45; 4,897 men and 2,142 women between 46 and 50; 8,881 men and 1,764 women between 51 and 55; 2,985 men and 1,616 women between 56 and 60; and 8,120 men and 1,794 women between 61 and 90. It is obvious, therefore, that the remaining indentured Indians will grow rapidly less in number through death alone. Over 13,000 have returned to India under the repatriation and assisted emigration schemes, and it is believed that when the last of the indentured Indians have died or returned to India the stream of returning Indians will practically cease. It was estimated in 1931 that there were 163,400 Indians in Natal, so that it will be seen that about 80 per cent. of them are South African-born. There are 6,511 Indians in the Cape, 15,500 in the Transvaal and only 100 in the Free State.—Indian Opinion.

GOVERNMENT BY THE MAJORITY— DEMOCRACY.

(BY MRS. I. J. PITT.)

In view of the fact that some form of democratic government suited to Indian conditions will be inaugurated in the near future, some remarks on the democratic system may not be out of place.

A right understanding of how this system works is very necessary in India at present, because in accordance with this system a momentous transference of responsibility and power into India's hands will be carried through.

Will it not be right to surmise that the following thoughts are in the minds of many Indian politicians?

1st. Distrust—because it appears as if the Government had changed its liberal policy, and was yielding to the outcries of the "Die-Hards".

2nd. Resentment—because whenever any Government pronouncement is made that is favourable and just to India, some opposition is sure to spring up, trying to discredit it, as in the case of Lord Willingdon's last Viceregal speech which Lord Salisbury sought to discredit.

3rd. Deep disappointment—They say—what is the use of all these R. T. Conferences, Joint Select Committees and discussions when the result is a scheme which is more or less dissatisfying to everyone. "We asked for bread and you have given us a stone."

These depressing thoughts are very natural and indeed inevitable to those who have not had the experience of living under a Democratic System, or who take a shallow view, and who do not understand how its machinery works.

To the well informed democrat the above facts indicated under numbers, 1, 2, 3, would give no rise to distrust, resentment or disappointment, because to take the three points in question one by one—

1st. Distrust, from seeming change of policy. The National Government has not changed its policy, as it could not do so. A Party comes into power on its affirmation of a certain policy on all questions with which it will have to deal. So long as it is in power it must keep to that same policy. A change of policy will not occur until the said Party goes out of power. As there are no signs of the National Government going out of Power in the near future, we may be sure of the same policy until then.

2nd. Resentment with the Opposition. The Opposition is a necessary part of the Democratic system. It is the business of the Opposition to oppose. The more important the Bill to be passed through Parliament the more deep the feeling about it will be, and therefore, the more violent will be the opposition.

The immense importance of the India Bill can be gauged by the violence of the Opposition.

But we need not be disturbed by this so long as the Opposition is not strong enough to cause a vote of censure against the party in power, which would have to be followed by a General Election, and the Opposition coming into power. There are no signs so far of such an eventuality.

Consequently when Opposition springs up discrediting Government, we expect it, and look upon it as nothing but "Parliamentary Procedure."

3rd. Disappointment with the White Paper Scheme which satisfies no one. This disappointment would not have prevailed if close attention had been paid to the pronouncements of Government. Sir Samuel Hoare repeatedly warned India that no one could possibly be fully satisfied because when many diverse claims and wishes had to be considered equally, the outcome could be nothing but a compromise.

realpatidar.com

Now a compromise means that each party must sacrifice some of their individual wishes, so that all may unite. Evidently no one can be satisfied, but patriots will be willing to sacrifice something for the sake of unity.

Compromise is an essential of Democratic Government. In other words, The rule of the Majority.

Democratic Government can only move by progressive steps. With the difficult conditions in India the White Paper proposals are found to be the only kind of scheme that will work.

Let us suppose that a new machine has to be constructed, and the order is given that it shall be perfect and symmetrical in shape above everything. This is done, and it is beautiful to look at, but when they start to work it they find it will not move. Its power to work has been sacrificed to its perfect shape.

Ugly, unshapely and unsatisfactory as the look of the New Constitution appears this Government machine is found to be the only one that will work.

And if it is worked by all with good-will, its shape can be gradually altered and improved by India's own hands until it is shaped into Full Dominion Status.

It should be realized that the British Government as a democracy is obliged to act in accordance with its democratic system.

Sir Samuel Hoare said that this coming transference of power into Indian hands will be one of the greatest events of history.

Are its deep import and immense potentialities sufficiently recognised in India?

THE HIMALAYAS.

"I am a scientist but I do not scoff at the worshipful attitude of the Indians towards the Holy Himalayas or regard it as a survival of the superstitions of more barbaric times," declared Sir Francis Young-husband, who was himself born in the Himalayan region, in a lecture at the Indian Institute at Oxford.

He said his seventy years' connection with the Himalayas only confirmed his sympathy with that attitude, which he recommended to his fellow Europeans as one worthy of adoption. The Alps had been called the playground of Europe where men went for climbing in summer and snow sports in winter, deriving plenty of healthy invigoration of the spirit from these exercises. But the Himalayas had for thousands of years been looked on by the Indians not as a playground but as a holy ground—the dwelling place of Gods, a sacred place for quiet meditation and spiritual refreshment.

When one sees high up in the heavens the snowy outline of the Himalayas, it seems incredible at first that this is part of our earth. Surely what is so high and so pure can only be heaven. The soul is lifted out of itself at the sight of these glorious mountains. No wonder they came to be regarded as sacred and the object of the deepest reverence by sages of ancient India.

When he first saw Kinchinjunga, he gave a gasp of sheer wonderment at such magnitude of glistening snow and ice, glorious, terrible and dangerous. He described the hushed forests extending to thousands of miles at the base of the mountains in which even to-day could be found saints engaged in meditation, who were veritable daysprings, spiritually radiating joy and contentment.

Happiness was the main characteristic of both human and animal life in the Himalayan forests. There was an intensity and richness of enjoyment, derivable from these mountains, which sportsmen could never find in the Alps.

BISHOP OF NATAL'S APPEAL.

An appeal for the spirit of fairplay, a more equal standard of living and increased facilities for sound education as a means of achieving co-operation between Europeans and Indians, and, thereby promoting the progress of the whole community, was made by the Bishop of Natal, Dr. Noel Fisher, in an address at a public conference on Race Relations in South Africa, held in Maritzburg, writes Indian Opinion.

It was sometimes assumed, said Dr. Fisher, that differences of tradition and outlook, such as were always found when race met race, were inevitably a hindrance to harmonious working. He did not believe that to be the case. It was true that when people were ignorant about each other and were afraid of the future there was the kind of atmosphere in which dissension and strife were easily born. It was not variety, but mutual ignorance and suspicion which was the real obstacle to right relations. So far from difference being a hindrance they might greatly enrich the life of a country, though only in so far as each race sought to represent its nationality at its best. European and Indian alike had much to contribute to the common good.

These were days of keen competition, and when those who competed were of different race, a fresh cause of bitterness was introduced. As it was impossible to eliminate competition, it was necessary to free it of its worst features.

"May I insist," said Dr. Fisher, "that co-operation is more fundamental than competition? When competition is fair, the result should be to raise the standard of efficiency and thus to promote progress to the benefit of the whole community. But it is essential that competition should be on fair and equal conditions. On the one hand, no one should be handicapped by artificial restrictions. But again no one should gain an unfair advantage owing to an uncivilised standard of living, enabling him to undersell his neighbours; nor by being able to pay lower wages to those whom he employs. We must press for fairplay, and for equitable conditions of employment that competition may be on a fair basis, as between the two races."

With a view to an improved standard of living and a larger measure of understanding and mutual appreciation, the benefits of sound education must be placed within the reach of all. That did not mean that all would be educated to the same level, but that each should receive the kind and degree of education which corresponds to his capacity and requirements. He believed that it was as important to educate the girls as the boys, for they were the future mothers, and on them depended the character of the homes.

If one could bring about those three things—the spirit of fairplay, a more equal standard of living and increased facilities for sound education—much would be done to provide the best conditions for that harmonious co-operation between Indians and Europeans which was in the best interests both of the individual and of the country as a whole.

There were many difficult problems, political, economic and social, which had to be solved. Europeans were demanding, as they had a right to do, the safeguarding of their Western civilisation and standards of life which they regarded as essential. Indians, on the other hand, were demanding, as they had a right to do, a recognised position in the life of the country and opportunities for progress. It was inevitable that politics should enter largely into the question and that efforts should be made from time to time to alter and adjust the laws of the land. He urged the exhibition of patience for which the East was famous and to trust the wisest leaders. Hasty and uncontrolled speech by European or Indian usually set back the hands of the clock.—Natal Mercury.

JABEZ T. SUNDERLAND.*

(BY JOSEPH W. EMSLEY.)

Dr. Jabez T. Sunderland, crusader for the public good, will observe his 92nd birthday tomorrow. Not many of us hope to knock off 92 birthdays, and many of us might be a bit jittery on approaching such an age, but not Dr. Sunderland! He seems destined to live on for a good many years yet, with passion for work in hand and a certain tranquil attitude toward life mixed in such proportions that he forges right ahead serenely.

I called on him this week at his Poughkeepsie home, which is with Mr. and Mrs. William J. Bolton at 214 Union Street. He spends part of his time here, and part of it with relatives in Michigan. A minister of the former Unitarian church here for 14 years, he likes Poughkeepsie, and enjoys being with his friends here from time to time.

It was a surprise to learn that Dr. Sunderland who is the author of numerous books, including the widely discussed "India in Bondage" is still writing. He is now busy on a book to be known as "Emerson and His Friends," and another, "The Best from All Religions of the World," a spiritual anthology on religions of the world. "India in Bondage" was completed in his late 80s!

Indeed, Dr. Sunderland even now devotes six or seven hours a day to writing, and with it appears to be enjoying the best of health. He is an ardent believer in the school of philosophy which holds that work is one of the principal things that keeps you going. He is not a crank in this respect, however, and probably idles his share of hours; he likes to take automobile rides; and he likes to talk. He still preaches occasionally, and his wealth of knowledge about men and things is such that it is no great effort for him to preach.

I asked him to impart his idea of how a person should live to reach an unusually old age.

"Take care of your health," he said, "Study the laws of life and obey them. Be cheerful and hopeful. Work hard and have an interest in something and stick to it!"

He eats his three squares, sleeps eight hours a day ordinarily, and when overtired sleeps nine hours.

Dr. Sunderland gave two addresses at the World Fellowship of Religion in Chicago last summer, and about a year ago preached a sermon at the First Congregational Church here.

His attitude toward life seems to be summed up in his observation:

"I don't want to live after I cannot be of any more use to humanity."

Coming from some people, that assertion might seem to indicate an over-zealous attitude in the interests of others, but from Dr. Sunderland it was quite a natural thing to say. He wasn't gilding the lily. In fact he has a robust sense of humor and appreciates his limitations, enjoys a joke on himself and all that. It is just that he has proved himself to be useful. He has scores of friends in India who keep writing to him. They constantly ask him to write things for Indian publications.

Dr. Sunderland is seriously interested in the welfare of humanity. He has become internationally known as outstanding among Americans in the knowledge of Indian affairs. His book, "India in Bondage" has been described as one of the most scholarly and truly representative works on the Indian question, from the standpoint of the Indian people themselves. Publication of the book in India has been banned by Great Britain, and that act alone, has been taken by some leading thinkers as a reliable indication of the influence of the book.

It is said that whatever side you take on the Indian question, whether you believe that Great

*From the Poughkeepsie Evening Star of February 14, 1934.

Britain is doing right by her subject people or not, a broad understanding of the problem cannot be had without knowledge of Dr. Sunderland's studies in the matter. A native of England himself, he loves and respects his home country, although taking issue with its policies in India.

Dr. Sunderland was born in Howarth, Yorkshire, England. He came to this country with his father, Thomas Sunderland, when he was two, the family settling in Jamestown, N. Y. in the region of the Chautauqua Lake. His father died when he was a child, and his mother was left with five children. His lot was not easy, and it was entirely through his own efforts he received an education.

The family moved to Iowa when Dr. Sunderland was a boy. He attended Burlington College institute, Burlington, Iowa, and spent two years at Colgate university. His studies were interrupted by the Civil War; he joined the boys in blue of the Seventh N. Y. Heavy Artillery, serving on the Potomac for about a year and a half. He came out of the war uninjured and resumed his studies at Chicago university.

Dr. Sunderland married Eliza Read, who was a school principal at Aurora, Ill., and at that time the only woman public school principal in the country. They had three children, two of whom are living. Mrs. Gertrude Safford, a daughter, is the widow of the Dr. Safford, who was a physician of Detroit, Mich.; she is a former president of the largest Women's City Club in Detroit. A daughter, Florence, who died eight years ago, was a teacher at one time in the George Washington High School, New York City. Dr. Sunderland's son is a professor of law at the university of Michigan.

He received his bachelor of arts degree at Chicago in 1867, completing his training in the divinity school of the same institution in 1870. He then became pastor of the Baptist church at Milwaukee.

Most of his years of service as a minister were with the Unitarian denomination. He served first at the Unitarian parish in Northfield, Mass., and held charges in Ann Arbor, Mich., Chicago, Hartford Conn, Toronto, Canada and in London.

Dr. Sunderland spent two long winters in India, in the years 1895-96 and 1913-14, and made special studies of Indian art, literature, philosophy and religion. He has written three books about India. They are: "India and World Brotherhood," "The Causes of Famine in India," and "India in Bondage." One or more of these have been published in translated form in India, France and Japan, as well as America. "India in Bondage" has been in special demand, and has been distributed in 500 libraries in the world. There are 26 copies of it in the New York City library, and 12 in the Boston library. A new and enlarged edition was printed last year in this country. It contains eight new chapters.

The author of 20 or more books, Dr. Sunderland is widely known through his "The Origin and Character of the Bible," which went into six editions, and was circulated in Russia, Bulgaria and more recently in India. Among his works are a number of pamphlets in exposition of the Unitarian faith which have been in great popular demand.

In all his writing, Dr. Sunderland had been a fighter for peace. "I fought in the Civil War," he said, "but I am a pacifist to the marrow. I have travelled a good deal and wherever I went I never could see why nations should resort to the destructive and demoralizing forces of warfare to settle their differences."

Yes, there will be a simple birthday party tomorrow! Some of Dr. Sunderland's friends are planning to call on him, among them some persons from Vassar College.

realpatid NATIONAL COUNCIL OF WOMEN.

The fourth biennial conference of the National Council of Women in India was held in Bombay, on Tuesday evening when the Maharani of Baroda presided.

The Mayor of Bombay, Dr. M. C. Javle, extended a cordial welcome to the delegates to the conference to Bombay and, in explaining the benefits of the primary education being given to children in the city, invited the delegates to visit some of the social welfare institutions in Bombay.

The deliberations of the Conference were inaugurated by Mrs. S. Faiz Tyabji, chairman of the reception committee, with an address in which she drew attention to three or four main heads of activity of the Council. Mrs. Tyabji first mentioned the attempts of the Council to influence legislation. She thought it time that the Council opened its eyes and expressed its strong opposition to social institutions which had for their basis the exploitation of women, Child marriages, no less than the traffic in women would be abolished if old notions were ruthlessly swept aside. While the Council had been labouring with this subject, much yet remained to be done.

In regard to education, the Council had endeavoured to take steps to promote vocational training and nursing, and intended raising its voice against the curtailments of Government expenditure on this head. Mrs. Tyabji also hoped that the Council might be able to do some useful work in raising the standard of cinema films displayed in India.

In her presidential address, the Maharani of Baroda said that the most important question before the Conference was that of woman's suffrage under the new form of Government to be introduced into India. If women in the country were all agreed as to what they wanted in the matter, they could press their claim with some force and with a reasonable chance of success. At present, the aim of women should be to secure adequate representation in proportion to their numbers, so as to make their votes felt in the many matters that affected them.

The laws of property, especially the Hindu laws of inheritance and property, the Maharani thought, was one such matter. The injustice of these laws, she stated, was quite evident. Women could not afford to be mere dependants on men in matters of property, if they desired full scope for self-expression and development of their personality. They must be afforded right to inherit, acquire and deal with property on the same basis as men. Many Hindu women, the speaker continued, were anxious to have a law of divorce passed for them, but a divorce law without proper laws of property and inheritance would be a misfortune.

Proceeding, Her Highness said "If we—I mean society as a whole—are to progress the old shackles must be shaken off. Our women are meek, submissive, ready to suffer without complaining and obey without questioning. In our homes, this is the ideal held out before our girls. I have no faith in this ideal. It is necessary that we should reform the methods of educating our girls. They should be taught self-reliance, and a healthy fighting spirit should be infused in them. However, do not think that I advocate war against men. It will do no good to our cause.

"In what I am proposing there is no peril involved to human society. If the matter were considered dispassionately there could hardly be any difference of opinion about it.

"My ideal woman would think freely for herself and yet act boldly in co-operation with men. I am a great believer in co-operation. If only men and women could co-operate on an equal footing in the business of life, the happiness of both would increase in a great measure and make human society stronger and healthier.

"Let me tell you frankly that Ranis and Maharanis and other ladies of rank and position, especially those living in purdah, have their own special disabilities and suffer from more hardships than women of the working classes. I have come to know that, as many ladies have come to me with their tales of sorrow. They require your help as much as the women of the labouring classes, and I wish you to take up their cases also."

The fourth biennial report of the Council was then read out to the meeting by Miss Leah Jhirad. The report stated that the Labour Committee had continued its work and considered some of the recommendations made by the Whitley Committee, as well as the information collected by the Committee in 1930. One of the suggestions made by the Committee was that Provincial labour conferences should be held in order to stimulate an interest in labour conferences.

The Legislation Committee had kept in touch with all bills relating to women and children introduced in the Legislative Assembly and, in several instances, pointed out defects and suggested changes in various bills to the members who introduced them. The Council had also done much useful work in connection with adult education, mothercraft, the beggar problem, hospital visiting, women's workrooms and industrial institutions, relief work, play centres, creches, child welfare and other branches of activity intimately connected with women and children.

Lady Cowasji Jehangir (Senior), who has been actively connected with social welfare work in Bombay, welcomed the delegates to the Conference and, in doing so, drew a vivid contrast in the civic life of Bombay and welfare work to-day, as compared to that of the past decade. "Go forward slowly but steadily, undertake only those activities which you can fulfill successfully, and remember at the same time that the East cannot blindly follow the West," was her message to the delegates.

Mrs. Sarojini Naidu paid a warm tribute to the pioneering spirit of the President in the field of social welfare work, and supported her plea to women for an equal partnership with men in the service of humanity.

Mr. M. R. Jayakar pointed out the pitfalls in the franchise to be bestowed to women, and appealed to them to equip themselves to play an important part in the coming constitution of the country.

Mrs. Maneklal Premchand, chairman of the Council, proposed a vote of thanks to the Chair.

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCES.

Lively discussions marked the proceedings of the fourth Biennial Conference of the National Council of Women in India, on Wednesday morning when the delegates met in the University Convocation-Hall for the first session.

In the absence of H. H. The Maharani Sahab of Baroda, Mrs. Tarabai Premchand presided over the session.

The Conference passed a condolence resolution on the demise of Sir Dorabji Tata, who donated Rs. 10,000, for the Women's Council. Sympathy was expressed with the Lady Aberdeen, Chairman of the London Sub-Committee on her sad bereavement in the loss of the Marquess of Aberdeen.

Miss Leah Jhirad, Secretary in her report for the previous term, stated that the N. C. W. I. was carrying on useful service through various committees and particularly taking interest in the Labour problem. The first provincial Labour Conference organised under the auspices of the Women's Council was a success, and resulted in increased interest in Labour questions and practical work in Labour areas.

The Legislation Committee had kept in touch with all the Bills relating to women and children and in many instances pointed out the defects and suggested changes to the members introducing those bills. One novel suggestion accepted by the Women's Council was the compilation of a Directory of women social workers of the country, who could thus be communicated to when necessary. Miss Jhirad said that the work of gathering this information was well under way. A delegate was appointed by the Government to represent the League of Nations Advisory Commission on the Welfare and Protection of Young Persons and Children at the instance of the N. C. W. I., in the person of Mrs. S. Subbarayan.

The proceedings took a lively turn and brisk discussion followed when after the presenting of the reports of various sub-committees, Mrs. Hamid Ali opened the question of the representation of the Women's Council at International Women's Conferences held overseas.

Mrs. Hamid Ali took exception to the fact that at these conferences Indian womanhood was being represented by non-Indians who formed the majority of India's representatives. She laid the blame at the door of the London Sub-Committee which had on itself more non-nationals than Indians. She, therefore, suggested that representatives to women conferences abroad should be selected entirely by the Women's Council in India, and that the majority of them should be Indians, while she appreciated the interest displayed and help rendered by non-national ladies in land.

Mrs. Mackenzie explained that sufficient numbers of Indian women were not forthcoming who would be prepared to undertake the trouble and expense of attending these meetings, to which Mrs. Hamid Ali retorted that to her knowledge there were 400 or 500 educated and suitable ladies all over Europe who could properly represent the Indian women.

Mrs. Tarabai Premchand explained that the London Sub-Committee were not electing the representatives. However, it was not possible to send all Indian ladies as delegates. The former procedure was that ladies willing to represent Indian women at these conferences in foreign lands wrote to them expressing their desire to represent India, and if the N. C. W. I. felt that they would be ably represented by such ladies they accorded them permission to do so.

A number of ladies who had wide experience of foreign travel and thorough knowledge about the movements in other lands partook in the discussion. The feeling that Indian women ought to be represented by nationals was keenly commented upon by other ladies who had no objection to representation by women of any nationality provided they had the interests of the Indian women at heart.

Constitutional difficulties were mentioned by Mrs. Mackenzie. Mrs. Rajji suggested that the London Sub-Committee be separated and a New Council comprising the Indian women abroad be formed which could be affiliated to the N. C. W. I. Mrs. Byramji was frank in her statement that the missionary ladies going out from India were responsible for a lot of misrepresentation on the Continent and when questioned about their representative capacity declared that they represented the N. C. W. I. and these ladies though not elected in India were being co-opted in London by the Sub-Committee.

Miss Jean Begg (Bengal) saw no objection to non-Indians representing Indian women while Mrs. Zubeda Fysee suggested that the majority of representatives at conferences overseas should be Indian women.

At this stage, Mrs. Premchand suggested that further informal discussion might be carried on at the various 'At Homes' arranged for the delegates.

New Office-Bearers elected for the ensuing term were:—Mrs. Tarabai Premchand, Chairman; Miss Leah Jhirad, Secretary; and Miss Naurange and Mrs. Rajji, Hamid Ali and Hansa Mehta, Members of the Governing Body.

ARYA GIRLS IN NAIROBI.

The Kenya Daily Mail Correspondent writes from Nairobi, February 21: The Girl Students of Arya Kanya Mahavidyalaya of Baroda accompanied by their Principal and Secretary Pandit Anadpriyaji, Mr. Chaturbhai, Principal, Gurukul Songarh and Mr. Manilal, Secretary, Hindu Mission, arrived in Nairobi on the morning of 18th February, from Mombasa.

They were enthusiastically received on the Station by the officers and members of the Arya Pratinidhi Sabha, local Arya Samaj, the girls of the local Arya Putri Pathshala and students of Sharadhanand Brahmacharyashram and other members of the public of Nairobi. The Arya Samaj Band was in attendance and the party was taken in procession to the Arya Samaj Rest House where they are to stay in Nairobi.

On the morning of 19th instant public welcome was arranged and after Sandya, Havan and Bhajans, Mr. Sharma on behalf of the Nairobi public welcomed the guests and expressed his great satisfaction for the adventurous spirit of the Institution and wished success to the deputation.

Pandit Anand Priyaji explained the subject of the visit which he said was missionary propaganda and education for the girls. His speech was enthusiastically received by the audience. After the Bhajans the meeting terminated.

In the evening of the same day the girls of the Arya Kanya Mahavidyalaya of Baroda, India, gave a demonstration in the compound of the Arya Kanya Pathshala of Nairobi when over five thousand Indian men, women and children were present to witness an interesting and stirring programme. In the 14 items of programme was included music, drill and physical culture feats, arrow aiming, dagger fight and spear drill, etc. All these feats impressed every one assembled unreservedly and drew praise and applause.

In a speech, in Hindi, in the middle of the programme, Miss Subhadra Kumari, Mahavidyalaya's medalist, impressed on the audience the present deplorable state of Hindu society in the matter of physical culture, orthodox modes of Purdah etc., and compared these with the progressive womanhood of the West where women were in the forefront in literature and science; in flying and swimming, in commerce and profession and every other field, hitherto supposed to be a reserve for men. Explaining that the Arya Mahavidyalaya did not teach only physical culture but all such subjects and languages as Hindi, English, Sanskrit and Gujarati, Geography, needlework, cooking, etc., which would make to-day's girls fit women to take their places in tomorrow's India, Miss Subhadra Kumari appealed to the audience to give liberal education to their daughters to ensure that India as a nation did not lag behind. She also pointed out that to-day's Indian women needed physical culture as much as men and that women had as much right to God's free gifts of pure air and light as men which purdah system denied them.

The whole programme was an eye-opener to most of those who had assembled on the occasion and will revolutionise our ideas about girls' education. Local schools, especially Arya Kanya Pathshala under the management of Mr. Arya Muni Varma, M. A., have already been teaching music, garba dances, etc., and this visit of Baroda scholars will give them an impetus to go further in their reforms.

HARIJAN FUND.

Inviting opinion on Harijan Seva Sangh (Delhi) draft rules for the disbursement of his Harijan Purse Fund Mahatma Gandhi writes in Harijan:

(1) About a month or two after the collections of the purse fund of each province, the existing financial relations between the Central office and the Provincial office may cease in favour of the new financial relations arising out of the new purse fund, which are described below. The fund is called the Gandhi Harijan Purse Fund.

(2) The expenses incurred after the passing of the welfare schemes should be charged to the "purse fund" that is, it will come out of the 75 per cent quota of the purse fund, or out of the 50 per cent in the case of principal cities. Grants for administrative and propaganda expenses will be continued to be paid according to the existing system, that is, one half or two-thirds, or whatever the ratio may be, of such expenditure, out of the central fund, from which the "purse fund" will be kept separate.

(3) Except for Bombay, Calcutta, Karachi and similarly circumstanced cities, at least 75 per cent of the money collected in each town, district or province will be spent in that place, or area or the province, if the following two conditions are satisfied:

(a) A scheme, including all the old commitments, of welfare work for utilising the quota of the "purse fund" money is proposed, submitted and approved by the Central office.

(b) Whole time, honorary or part-time workers are forthcoming for working out the approved scheme or schemes and their names approved. In appointing permanent workers, care should be taken to see that they have had at least two years' continued service.

(4) The "purse fund" should be spread over a period of not less than two years, according to circumstances, at the discretion of the workers of the locality concerned, with the approval of the provincial workers.

(5) The money will be forthcoming by instalments, as may be required, on presentation of monthly bills of expenditure incurred on welfare schemes. Reasonable advances, however, will be made to keep the work going.

It is the special desire of Gandhiji that out of the purse fund not a single rupee should be spent for administration and propaganda of the provincial, district or other offices and that the purse money should be utilised for no other purpose than the execution of schemes for Harijan welfare work.

(6) The ear-marking of donations should be done at the time of the donation and not after. And in each case, when ear-marking is done, it will be accepted only if Gandhiji approves.

(7) Special cases of districts requiring extra help over 75 per cent would be considered only on the grounds of the poverty of the district, or the extraordinary scope for work in the district or the unusually large number of Harijans in the district.

(8) In regard to Taluk organisations and their finances, schemes from the Taluks which have paid money to the fund will receive due consideration in relation to such schemes. There need be no paid Secretary or Office in the Taluks.

(9) The Provincial Secretary as also the District Secretaries, should cease to be officers, but should become necessary parts of the welfare schemes. The charges of the provincial staff needed for supervising schemes in the districts will thus be met from the 75 per cent quota and taken from the district in proportion to their budgets. Workers necessary for supervising welfare schemes may be treated as part of the constructive expenses.

All those who belong to various Harijan Sevak organisations or are otherwise interested in the cause are invited to send to the Secretary, Central Board, as early as possible their suggestions on the foregoing draft rules. The object is to incorporate in the final rules the wisdom of those who have helpful suggestions to make. Perhaps it is more difficult to spend the money wisely than it was to collect it. The chief difficulty will be to find whole time trustworthy and otherwise competent workers. In making their recommendations, therefore, local Sanghas and individuals will bear in mind the difficulty about workers. Schemes, moreover, which would admit of employing Harijans by preference must be more acceptable than those in which such special qualifications may be required as to make it impossible to employ Harijans. Suffice it to say that the aim of every scheme should be the greatest and the quickest amelioration of the educational and economic condition of Harijans with the funds available. Thus the general rules can only be indicative and elastic, so as to cover as wide a range of schemes as might be formulated by the Provincial and District Sanghas.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Conversion and Communal Representation:—The question whether a member of a Municipal Committee, Lahore, on his conversion to another religion can remain as a member will shortly be discussed by the Lahore Municipal Committee at a general meeting. The point has arisen following the conversion of a European member, Mr. W. J. Faireley, to Islam recently. At the last meeting of the Committee Pandit Sant Ram raised the objection that Mr. Faireley, who, he said, was representing the interests of the Anglo-Indian community, could not participate in the discussion, as he had changed his religion. The President pointed out that the matter could be discussed separately. Pandit Sant Ram has now given notice of a resolution, that Mr. Faireley, who was nominated by the Government to represent the interests of the European and Anglo-Indian community in the Lahore Municipal Committee could not participate in the Municipal Committee as he had changed his religion. The Pandit's objection is that Mr. Faireley had left the Christian religion and therefore, he had no right to remain in the Municipality on behalf of the European community.

The Golden Toy In London:—An attempt to portray the glamour and colour of Indian life for London theatregoers has been made at enormous cost in the London Coliseum with the production of "The Golden Toy," founded on the Old Indian play, "Vasantaena." Half the great theatre has been transformed into a replica of an Indian temple while all the mechanical resources of the Coliseum's revolving stage have been employed in representing twenty colourful episodes of Indian bazaars, streets and temples. The dresses for the production alone cost £5,000. At one point, the stage revolves in concentric circles simultaneously, forming a veritable panorama of Indian scenery; but despite the labour and expense of the production, the play remains a queer conglomeration, for this Indian tale has been rewritten by a German and produced by another German, Ludwig Berger, to the music of S. J. Humann while the cast includes a romantic actress Miss Peggy Ashcroft, conspiring oddly with the healthy, music hall humours of such old troopers as the comedienne, Nellie Wallace, and the acrobat, Lupino Lane. The show is a masterpiece of Teutonic ingenuity and is impressive from a spectacular point of view but the playgoer is left wondering whether the atmosphere of the production is that of the East, Germany, England—or just plain London Coliseum?

Storm Troopers Kidnap A Jew:—Seven Nazi Storm Troopers have been sentenced from three to six years penal servitude on a charge of kidnapping a wealthy Jew, who was a manufacturer of Chemnitz, and attempting to extort ransom. The victim, Herr Otto Schlesinger, was held up while motoring to Chemnitz, forced at the point of the revolver to enter a Nazi car, and driven to Berlin. He was allowed to send a telegram to his wife saying that he had been summoned to Berlin on urgent business, but he astutely signed the telegram in his surname. The wife concluded that something wrong had happened, and telephoned to all her Berlin friends who informed the police. Herr Otto Schlesinger telephoned to a friend to stand with the ransom amount of several thousand marks outside Zoo station. The Nazis drove up with Herr Schlesinger, received an envelope, released Herr Schlesinger, and drove off immediately, pursued by a police car. They were captured after an exchange of shots with the police.—Reuter.

Disarmament:—The League of Nations are now more hopeful of the eventual success of disarmament in consequence of the indications of a changed attitude in Britain which is believed to be now favouring the idea of common action in the event of a violation of the provisions of the disarmament convention. It is also gathered that influential French opinion has undergone a considerable change as regards the question of German rearmament. A White Paper on disarmament has been issued today of which the chief feature is the letter of M. Barthou dated February 10 emphasizing the French attitude in unmistakable language and explaining the impasse into which the negotiations had drifted. It is hoped that the new French memorandum expected next week in reply to the British proposals of February 9 will show an advantage facilitating negotiations. M. Barthou's letter of February 10 asserts that France is unable to accept any calculations excluding formations which are of an incontestably military character and also unable to accept an immediate reduction of armaments accompanied by immediate rearmament by the Powers bound by the military clauses of the treaties. It emphasizes the necessity of guarantees in the event of a violation of the disarmament convention, urging a rapid solution in consequence of the pace at which certain countries are rearming contrary to the provisions of the treaties.

Religion in Marriage:—Mixed marriages between Anglicans and Roman Catholics are condemned by the Bishop of Chichester, Dr. G. K. A. Bell, in an article in his Diocesan Gazette. Such marriages, he says, ought to be discouraged and avoided. A marriage, to be happy, ought to be built on an agreement in religious belief. He points out that one condition under which mixed marriages are permitted in the Catholic Church is that the non-Catholic party guarantees to remove the danger of perversion from the Catholic party and both promise to baptize and educate all their children in the Catholic faith. The Bishop comments that to make such promises is to renounce all share in the religious life of the children to be born. Such promises are unjust and must not be made under any circumstances by an Anglican person, come what may. The Roman Church has no power to exact such pledges as it would be equally unjust for an Anglican to require that a Roman should promise to bring up their children in the faith of the Church of England. Dealing with what he describes as maimed ceremonies for the celebration of mixed marriages in the Roman Catholic Church, the Bishop writes that it will be very obvious that even for the Roman partner, the whole procedure of entering and continuing the married state is made exceedingly disagreeable but it is frankly intolerable for the Anglican.

Arbitrary Arrests Forbidden:—General Goering has forbidden arbitrary arrests by Storm Troopers and minor Nazi officials. Henceforth arrests must be ordered by the Secret Police and Provincial Governors, and must be telegraphed to Goering. Further, arrests if unconfirmed within a week will become invalid.

NOTES

The late Dr. A. L. Nair:—The news of the sudden death of Dr. A. L. Nair on Monday evening plunged many households in gloom. He was 72 years of age. He was seriously ill two years ago and his constitution was not robust. Beginning life without adventitious aids he made a career for himself; and his firm became famous as the pioneer in the manufacture of medical and surgical goods in India. Behind this successful man of the world there grew up another man who overshadowed him during the last twelve or thirteen years of Dr. Nair's life. For several years Dr. Nair has been attracted by the gracious life and teachings of Bhagvan Buddha. During the latter part of his life he became more and more absorbed in the endeavour to give shape and form to the influence of the Master on his own mind and character. Compassion is the keynote of Buddhist ethics. The last decade of Dr. Nair's life was filled with activities inspired by the desire to relieve suffering. He founded the model Hospital in the name of his mother and made it a teaching institution by taking over the National Medical College. But the institution which was closest to his heart was the Ananda Vihara which he raised in close proximity to the Hospital and the College. Its opening ceremony saw Dr. Nair in his happiest mood. It was indeed a great achievement to found in the heart of Bombay the Vihara with its atmosphere of Peace and Meditation. The Vihara is the true embodiment of the spirit of Dr. Nair. The last rites were performed under the guidance of a Buddhist monk who is resident in the Vihara. The large number of men and women of all castes and creeds who assembled at the House and were present at the cemetery to do homage to their departed friend, was a testimony to the catholicity of his friendship.

Death to such a soul is but the gateway to eternity.

The dewdrop slips into the shining sea.

The Gaekwar's Tribute to the Indian Press :—The Indian Press is the butt of much official and unofficial calumny nowadays. Bureaucracies have always hated the Press. Between them and the Press there is fixed a gulf as wide as that between Darkness and Light. This is aggravated by the character of the bureaucracy, which governs India. We have to take this as inherent in the circumstances, and the more experienced journalists do so. Even more than to the bureaucracy, and for obvious reasons, the Indian Press is the black beast of certain (numerically considerable) Princes who dread nothing so much as letting the light of day on their affairs. The result is that the Indian journalist is perforce a practitioner of Nietzsche's famous precept, "Live dangerously." The laws are so framed that the only safeguard for a journalist is the contemptuous indifference of our rulers to the Indian Press, whether well-conducted or ill-conducted. But the Princes cannot afford to be indifferent. It is several years since a very high administrator bitterly remarked to this writer that he did not mind the criticisms of the papers written in English—he has become used to them—but the vernacular papers are read by his wife and daughters and "damn it," he said, "one does not like to be held up to ridicule and contempt in his own family." However Indian women nowadays read English newspapers as well as their male relatives. The distinction between the vernacular and English papers, therefore, no longer exists. This is the secret of the enormous increase in the power of the Press in recent years as also of the desperate efforts made to get the Legislature and the Executive to suppress free criticism. There are people who cannot speak of the Press without prefixing the word "gutter" and of journalism without the adjective "irresponsible." It is their mentality that really merits these epithets. The Maharaja Gaekwar's warm recognition of the services rendered by the Indian Press to the cause of reform, especially at this time, is highly appreciated and it may be commended to the powers that be, in Simla and New Delhi. The Maharaja's address at the Karsandas Mulji centenary meeting, is printed in this issue.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

The Origin of Untouchability.—Mr. Venkatrama Sastry in his learned article on "Sanatana Dharma and Untouchability," which we print today, shows that the custom has no basis in the fundamentals of Hinduism. In fact, the Sanatana Dharma consists only of certain mental and moral states deduced from the metaphysical assumptions of Hinduism. Customs are the outcome of social necessities and these can be changed though so long as they remain unchanged they enjoy the sanction of religion as of the legislature. Hinduism can be credited with responsibility for the custom only on the principle that the sovereign commands what he permits. As for purity, cleanliness and so on, they were not important considerations with Hindu legists. "Cleanliness, is next to godliness," is obviously a precept for a society in which bathing was an act of impiety. The Indian plunges into running water whenever he gets the chance and, personally, he needs no maxim to keep himself clean. Consequently, uncleanness by itself could not have originated a custom or sentiment so deep-rooted as untouchability. If we examine some of the circumstances in which untouchability attaches to caste Hindus themselves, we find that it is intended more as a measure of protection than of punishment. An instance within our knowledge is of interest in this connection. There is near by a colony of Mahars—who are a very clean people—who have been desirous of acquiring permanently the land on which they are permitted to make their dwellings. Some caste Hindu friends have interested themselves in getting the land for them. One of them mentioned casually that he himself would like to have a cottage on the site. The idea, it was made plain, was not acceptable to the Mahars. They do not want anyone except Mahars and they too of their own group to live in their midst.

Philippine Independence in Sight.—A Reuter's message says that a Bill granting independence to the Philippine Islands, without the clauses relating to military and naval bases which figured in a previous draft, has passed the Assembly. Future relations between the United States and the Islands are to be settled by negotiation in the next two years. The Bill is now before the Senate where it is assured of a safe passage. The United States, when this measure becomes law, will have put itself right with the moral order of the world; and this will go far to give her a position of leadership in the international movements of our time. A few days ago, Sir Frederick Whyte, who was for some time President of the Indian Legislative Assembly, went out of his way to tell Americans that they should not grant independence to the Philippines as the British Government would not like it. It is a most enviable quality of the English character that it believes that all the world all the time is considering what would please the British in order that it may do it. As it happens, however, the American cousins are in one of their least amiable moods towards their kindred on the other side of the Atlantic whom Senator Borah, in an impassioned diatribe evoked by a mild remark of Mr. Baldwin's, recently accused of rank ingratitude in forgetting that but for their gallant American boys the 'English' Channel would be now a German lake! If Sir Frederick's advice had any effect on the American mind it would seem it was the very opposite of what he would have wished.

Earthquake and Non-Co-operation.—As the result of his personal inspection of the devastation caused by the earthquake in Bihar, Gandhiji at a meeting of leaders and workers held at Patna moved a resolution tendering to the Government their respectful co-operation in the prosecution of the common object, namely, relieving the unparalleled distress that has overtaken Bihar. Although he was a full-fledged non-co-operator, he said, as soon as he heard about the earthquake disaster, he thought that the situation could be successfully tackled only by co-operation between Government and the people. To an objection that such piecemeal co-operation would be misunderstood and if they have to co-operate they should boldly declare for co-operation in all matters, Malaviyaji pointed out that their "war with Government" was not for all time and did not preclude meeting on a common platform. He clinched his argument by declaring that not to co-operate on such occasions would be a sin. He added that so far as the political fight with Government was concerned he was for peace on honourable terms. There are now at least two matters in which co-operation with Government is permitted to non-co operators. They are anti-untouchability work and Bihar relief. These will no doubt gradually multiply. As a matter of fact, non-co-operation is not now a live issue.

The "Witness" Recants.—We quoted in the leading article on Christian Colleges in the last issue of the Reformer, the bold declaration of the Indian Witness that Christian Colleges do not exist for the purpose of turning any one from his ancestral faith, which is opposed to the whole spirit and teaching of Jesus. We are not surprised to see that this intrepid statement has evoked a vehement protest from a missionary correspondent but we are surprised that, instead of standing by its declaration, the Witness tries to wriggle out of it in a disingenuous manner. We reprint its paragraph as an excellent illustration of the way in which good men honestly trying to understand and interpret Christ, are obliged to resort to prevarication: owing to the conditions in which missions have to be carried on in this country.

Foreign Doctors.—At a meeting of Bombay medical men resolutions were passed demanding legislation to control the admission of foreign doctors on the principle of reciprocity and exempting from the scope of this resolution those who came as refugees from religious or political persecution in pursuance of the immemorial Indian tradition.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, MARCH 24, 1934.

KURSANDAS MULJI CENTENARY.

For some days past public meetings have been held in several places to celebrate the centenary of the birth of Kursandas Mulji, one of the pioneers of social reform. The great meeting held in Bombay on Monday was a fitting climax to the celebrations. His Highness the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda was to have presided over the meeting but he could not attend owing to temporary indisposition. His place was taken by Her Highness the Maharani—herself an unprecedented reform—who presided a few days ago over the Women's Conference which is the outcome of the labours of Kursandas Mulji and other leaders of the social reform movement. They instinctively realised that the first step in social reform should be the emancipation of the women of India from the deadening effect of superstitions and the enlistment of their support to the reforms needed to energise and invigorate social life. Kursandas Mulji started his career as social reformer with few advantages. But he had 'a dauntless spirit and a press.' In his weekly paper the Satyā Prakash, or the Light of Truth, he denounced the customs which kept women ignorant, superstitious and abjectly submissive to customs of a depressing and, in some cases, of a derogatory character. He belonged to the Vallabhacharya sect of Vaishnavas. Vallabha himself was a great protestant. In contrast to the other great sects of Hinduism, which regard the world as a snare and a delusion and a hindrance to the spiritual life, Vallabha taught that a happy life in this world was not necessarily an obstacle to salvation. The Brahmanical sects naturally repudiated his doctrine but they could not deny him a place in the Hindu system because he, unlike Jains and Buddhists, accepted the authority of the Vedas, and, indeed, derived his conclusions from the same canonical scriptures as they did theirs. The Vaishyas, the commercial caste, especially in Gujarat, accepted him as their spiritual head. Vallabha was an Andhra Brahmin and so are his successors in the several foundations of his sect. Even today their successors seek their brides from their original Telugu Brahmin group and do not intermarry with the castes which constitute their following. The Nambudris of Malabar offer the nearest analogy to the Vaishnava Maharajas, as the successors of Vallabhacharya are popularly known.

This sect was, as suggested above, unpopular with the other Hindu sects and, as has happened in similar cases, was from the first the butt of their ridicule and calumny. Owing, no doubt, to isolation from the main currents of religious thought in the country, abuses, some of them of a gross character, crept into the system and these in the course of his campaign against unhealthy social customs, Kursandas vigorously attacked in his weekly paper. The consequence was that he became involved in a libel suit—the last thing any reformer courts. After a prolonged hearing a Bench of the Bombay High Court found the reformer technically guilty but also found that his allegations against the complainant, one of the heads of the sect, were substantially proved, and awarded the latter one anna as damages. Many of the leading men of the caste at whose instance and instigation, Kursandas had launched his attacks, backed out at the critical moment, owing to pressure mainly from their families. But a few stood by him and he himself never faltered. To the popular mind, Kursandas is the hero of the Maharaj Libel Case. To himself, no doubt, this was only an episode, and an undesired episode, in his life which involved him in much anxiety and expense, proved a great strain on his slender resources and none too robust constitution and cut his life short at the early age of thirty eight years. The abuses which he exposed have become purified by the exposures which brought Kursandas into trouble. At the same time, it must be remembered that even before Kursandas started his campaign there was a growing feeling against them and that his writings were largely the expression of that resentment.

We do well to honour courage of conviction such as Kursandas exhibited, as others have done before and after him, in the face of bitter persecution. We should not, however, let the progress of reform depend on the appearance of heroic characters. "Make no more heroes. God, but elevate the race at once" is the fervent prayer of Robert Browning in one of his poems. Diseases of the social organism are most effectively treated by the method which psychiatrists use for the cure of mental diseases. By diving into the subconscious depths of the patient's mind they discover the particular "complex" which is at the root of his hallucination, and they convince him that but for it all is well with him. "Thou shalt know the truth and the truth will make you free," as the Maharaja Gaekwar aptly quoted in his presidential address. A great Teacher said that two thousand years ago, although a technique for it was found only within the last twenty years. The true method of social reform will be found to be to dive into the social consciousness, to bring up the "complexes" of social mentality and expose it before the tribunal of the social conscience. This is the negative side of the reformer's task. The positive side is more important. It is to place before the social imagination great and inspiring ideals of what life can and should be. "We needs must love the highest when we see it." There is something within us all which compels us to bow before whatever is good and true and beautiful. We may not all be able to adopt the ideal at sight and practise it in our lives. But it is no small gain to have the ideal implanted in our minds. Ideals have life. They grow silently, slowly, within us waking and sleeping and gradually transform our character. If not in us, in our children or children's children they will blossom out as an impelling motive. It is not a spectacular method but it is the only method by which a people can be weaned from a unhappy part of the past without sacrificing the much larger part that is healthy and vital in it. If history teaches one lesson more than another it is that revolutionary methods create worse problems than those which they set out to solve. If proof of this is needed, we have only to look around.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS AND GERMANY.

Since the advent of the Hitler regime exactly a year ago, consistent propaganda has been conducted in countries in Europe and in the United States against Germany. Mock trials of the Reichstag fire incident resulting in violent condemnation of the Nazi leaders have been held almost in all countries which felt that such action would not bring down retaliation from the German Government and protests from Germany have generally been disregarded. It is natural that a prominent part in such trials is played by men who had actually suffered under the new dispensation. A reaction has, however, recently set in and people are beginning to realise that, if Germany is not to be driven to exasperation, a more charitable attitude towards her respected leaders is desirable. Recent evidence of this was available when the local League of Nations Union debated the importance to the cause of peace of the Hitler movement. The debate was generally speaking conducted with restraint yet the next day the Times of India which reflects British reactions in international affairs, felt called upon to utter a warning against League of Nations organisations permitting such debates, particularly at a time when every effort was being made to bring Germany back to the League in Europe. At present it is fortunate that, owing to the fact that most European nations have still to recover from the effects of the last world war, their leaders are contenting themselves with recriminations. But this state of affairs cannot be permitted to continue long and the general trend is now to understand the more lasting principles underlying the Nazi movement.

It is significant that, despite reports of disparaging speeches on India and the Indian people, responsible opinion in this country has earnestly endeavoured to see the fundamental ideals of the Hitler movement. This has been greatly assisted by the communiques issued by German officials and by the speeches of Germans in India and Germany-returned Indians. The persecution of Jews is a feature of Central European politics. The periodic outbursts directed against the Jews is significant of the fact that the minority problem has yet to be settled even though Europe has had a freer hand in doing so than India. The League has not perfected its technique of solving this problem. An effort to secure its intervention in the interests of German Jews last year failed, like the Hindu Mahasabha appeal for its assistance in India. The present anti-semitic fury is not confined to Germany alone and it is unfortunate that the Nazi activities in this direction have obscured the more important achievements of the regime. If it is agreed, and no one now denies it, that an essential to world peace is the securing of an equal status with leading European nations for Germany, the fact that Nazi leaders look down on Hindus or Jews ought not to affect the value of their work in securing such status. The argument advanced at the Union debate, that Indian leaders sympathised with the German upheaval because they depended on the "Aryan ideal" for advancing the Indian cause is, to say the least, far-fetched. India is under no delusions as to the utility of gaining help from abroad.

DOMICILED BRITISHERS.

(By ARTHUR YOUNG.)

I fail to see what benefit will come to the Anglo-Indian community by this new change of name. There has already been one experiment from Eurasian to Anglo-Indian without making any difference except the sop it offered to some members overburdened with inferiority complex. It looks very much as if this new effort is another gift to the same people. The idea of being able to use the fresh label to differentiate Anglo-Indians from Indian Christians is absurd when a single family can possess one child as far as a Saxon and another as dark as an inhabitant of the Southern coast; as things are, these names can never be anything more than abstract quantities and as such they can have no real value.

A few years ago a number of letters appeared in The Statesman complaining against Roman Catholic Missionaries sending their educated Indian girls to Calcutta with English names and European clothes, to compete against the Anglo-Indians as office assistants and typists. The reply of one of these priests was illuminating. "If my girls apply for a post with an Indian name and in Indian clothes they are offered Rupees fifteen; if they use an English name and dress in keeping with it, many can command Rs. 100 and more. That they do the latter is only a proof of their common sense." What was wanted for these posts was not a question of race but a certain form of culture to meet a certain need. The missionary education of these girls supplied this and the rest was merely a matter of economic adoption.

As far as the "Domiciled Britisher" and European is concerned India is socially divided into two distinct camps. The club proper and the outsiders. Anyone who has travelled as I have done, cannot help noticing how fast these social divisions are becoming a matter of culture. To-day Indians in the Imperial Service are to be seen in almost every Gymkhana.

Politically, so long as this wretched communal warfare lasts, there is only one place for both the European and the Anglo-Indian. It is with the Indian Christian community. Here we have a real link with India and considering the fact that it is to us that these people owe their separateness it is our moral, and may I add our Christian, duty to stand by them.

THE UNIFICATION OF INDIAN CHRISTIANS.

(By K. N. DUTT.)

I as a Christian, can dare to say that at the present time the Indian Christian community in India, of all communities, has the least amount of personality in it. And this in spite of the fact that the figure for literacy among Indians is over 20 per cent, this being excelled by the Parsis and Buddhists only; also in spite of the fact that Christian women show a figure for literacy which is far greater than that shown by the women of any major community in this country. Yet we are beginning to hear ominous whispers telling us that our future is dark. In the course of this plea I will point out the reason why our future is going to be dark, even if we go on improving our educational standards, unless we radically change our outlook. I shall give at the outset a brief account of the admirable work done by foreign Christian Missions in this country.

In the first place, the high standard of education among Indian Christians is mainly to the credit of the Missionaries. The hour that the first missionary set foot in India from that hour he thought of educating the people among whom he laboured. He and his followers were responsible for incipient infusion of Western ideas into Indian soil. The British authorities of that time did not view with any alarm this process which was started by the missionaries. Since then, and especially in recent years, numerous schools have been started by them among the village communities of India. Large numbers of the depressed classes have found a status under their patronage, and for these depressed classes, the missions are running hospitals and dispensaries. The missions are also responsible for a large share in the higher education of Indian students. For all this, and much more, the missions are responsible.

From figures and facts we conclude, then, that as far as welfare-work is concerned, the Christian community is second to none in the whole of India. Has Providence decided not to show us the fruit of such admirable piety? In education and ideas we are comparatively well advanced but when it comes to a distribution of the honours and the living of the state, we find that the other communities swamp us out, and ominous whisperings tell us that this will be more so as India becomes more politically advanced. Although we are not one of the two major communities, we come next in numbers. On the whole list our numerical position is not bad, but even so there are many communities smaller than ours which are yearly gaining material advantage over us. To say that the Government of the country shows favouritism to these is to suggest an ugly immorality which does not in reality exist. There is no such thing as favouritism in the present case. It is a phenomenon of the people's force; to go against it would be to ruin the administrative machine. It is never wrong to act as far as possible according to the united demand of a community, because it is the chief way in which the administration can be continued with the greatest amount of smoothness. There is no country in the world where continued administration by the Government is not carried on in this way. It is the only way and it should not be called favouritism, but it should be called communal concentration, in the absence of a better term. The fact that a large number of posts are going to Mohammedans in the Punjab, for example, is a phenomenon of communal concentration which is made necessary by the united voice of the Mohammedan community in the Punjab, and supported by Mohammedan opinion all over India. A recent incident, though trifling, is interesting. A hospital nurse threw down the Koran of a patient. The fact that the Government had to give an immediate explanation, cannot be called favouritism toward the Mohammedans; the Government explanation, was demanded by the united voice of the community. It was necessary for the purposes of peaceful administration.

Half a century of missionary welfare work has been unable to produce a united voice in the Christian community of India. The fault is ours, not the missionaries.

This is what I mean when I say that our community has no personality. In the future constitution of India if we would have our status stable and our means of subsistence secure, we must unite our scattered forces. At the present moment our sense of responsibility is something appalling. Even in a single city, its Christians have no tendency towards concerted action. It may be that this deficiency arises from a misconception of certain principles in the Christian Faith and from an undue sense of dignity which new converts, especially from the depressed classes, imbibe when they become Christians. As long as these misconceptions remain, no amount of educational advancement will make us into that most vital body, a body politic. It is possible for a people to go on receiving education, as Indians have done for a century and a half, but the mental spark that makes of them a political whole, comes independently of this, and is later strengthened by proper instruction. Now the most important thing is to bring about a mental change among the Christians of India so that they may realise this urgent need which is made necessary when we come to think of our gloomy prospects. That we show a twenty percent figure in literacy has very little to contribute toward this mental change. We may be sure that the uneducated Mohammedan has a far greater sense of the wholeness of his community than the educated Christian. It is because of this sense, and for no second reason that when a Koran is thrown down, the Government provides an immediate explanation.

The size of the Christian population in the separate Provinces is small, and this is particularly true of the North. Therefore unification must take place on an all-India basis. If at this stage of the country's development we lose ground, we shall not be able to retrieve our position at any time within view. Only those communities can rally which have got sufficient force within them, traditionally or otherwise, and we frankly cannot flatter ourselves in this respect. To do so would be self-deception of the most destructive nature.

There is no alternative. Unite we must. There has been a tendency of late years to merge ourselves in the major communities. There is only one word to describe this tendency, and that is recklessness. The persons who advocate this type of recklessness are living in the ideal hope that in a short time the Christians of India will be able to emerge into an Utopia by the force of their great powers. The tendency I write of is no fancy. Even the writers of the Lindsay Report have said that "the Indian Christian community, if it maintains this attitude and continues to insist on losing its own life as a political entity, is bound to find it again in ways that mean infinitely more to the upbuilding of the true life of the land." This is beautifully put but the idealism it expresses deceives our community with pleasing flattery. To merge ourselves into the major communities, which, as far as practical thinking suggests, will continue to get increasingly hostile towards our community, would be to commit ourselves to a process of self-annihilation. Are we so ashamed of ourselves as to willingly submerge our personality? I think not.

The making of our personality—our political personality—is then, the supreme need of the present. And it can only come of an organised unity on an all-India basis, as stated before. An increased effort towards greater educational facilities, or towards a concentration of educational institutions, has little to contribute towards our political personality, as has been noticed during fifty years of educational work; an increased effort towards more religious instruction—and here I am going to shock many Christians—has nothing to contribute towards this personality. It is to be noticed immediately, that the Lindsay Commission has suggested far too little with regard to this new personality. True that this question was beyond its terms of reference, but then it cannot be doubted that the Report lends too much weight to those schemes and alterations which have little to do with the coming doom of the Christian community in India. We need schemes of an entirely different kind to deal with this.

Let me now state the problem before us with all concreteness. We need to evolve a studied scheme which will produce in the next few years in the minds of the educated and uneducated Christians of this country, a sense of political solidarity. We do not ignore here, the activities of the all-India Indian Christian Conference which meets once a year. It goes in for a very weighty agenda, even politics, but as far as our problem is concerned, it might well do more. The task into which we must plunge ourselves if we wish our community to continue with dignity, is a task which is full of difficulties which we shall overcome if God wants us to flourish on the soil of our land. It is needful to enumerate some of the obstacles in our way. The major portion of India's Christian population is in the south, but in this region it mostly abides in the Indian States. For this reason a large majority of the southern Christians do not come into contact with the problems which affect British India. A second difficulty in our way is the fact that by far the greater slice of the Christian population in India is in the villages. The third, and perhaps the most serious, obstacle is the absence of an all-India organisation whose foremost aim is the political regeneration of our community. It is for lack of such an organisation that it was possible for the Sikh community to persuade large numbers of village Christians to indicate themselves in the census as Sikh for the purposes of election votes. This baneful truth has been pointed out in the Lindsay Report.

Let us grapple with our task straight away:

In framing this organisation our work will be considerably facilitated if we can find some way of utilising certain Christian institutions which already exist in India. From our point of view these institutions can be listed into three important groups namely Churches, Colleges and Schools, and the Y. M. C. A's. Of these three groups the Colleges seem to me, to be pre-eminently fitted to undertake this pioneer enterprise. The first essential will be to bring all the Christian Colleges in India under the jurisdictions of one supreme Board of Control. The implications of this are many; in the first place it means that the finances will be pooled, and these finances will be dealt with by the Board of Control; it means that all transfer of teachers from one college to another will also be under the Board, so also will the appointment of new teachers; in a way the Christian Colleges will be affiliated to the Board of Control very much as the present colleges are affiliated to the University, but with this difference, that the Board will have much more control over the Christian colleges than the University at present has in all college affairs; this may mean that we will cut ourselves off from the University to a great extent, if not entirely, and follow our own curricula and our own methods of education; we may give our own degrees, and it will be a matter of time and the quality of instruction imparted by the Board Colleges, for various institutions to recognise our degrees.

It may be mentioned here, that the desire for amalgamation has already been shown in the union of the South India United Church with the Church in the Provinces of India, Burma and Ceylon, and Wesleyan Methodist Church. It is the call of our blood at this time, that all Christians—Protestants, Roman Catholics or Syrians—should unite for political life.

The establishment of one Board of Control will also mean that the entire management should come into Indian hands. And especially at the present time this appears particularly desirable for several reasons. For one, American conditions will not long allow of colleges being maintained in India at American expense; and then another reason is, and perhaps the most important reason, that under the new Indian conditions, the Central Government will be diminishingly inclined to dole out grants to colleges controlled by foreign Boards.

It is not needful for me to discuss this amalgamation further because it has been treated already in the Lindsay Report on Christian Education. The Report has investigated educational readjustments but what we emphasise is that the colleges should add to their teaching activities the political regeneration of the Christian community. Let us see how they can do this. A few lines of action suggest themselves immediately; they could arrange for parties of students and teachers to go into the villages and lecture the Christian populations there about political and social matters in easy and appealing language. The most important thing for these parties to keep in mind would be the creation of a strong sense of communal responsibility. This idea will sound to many people detrimental to the true and ideal interests of India, but let it be remembered that we must take conditions as they are if we Christians want to run a winning race in competition with the other communities of India. Another activity suggests itself: The Colleges should give their Christian students definite instruction on the political problems of India as they effect our community in particular. In this way the new personality will be created among the educated classes, and no place is better suited for this process than the colleges. That is why I believe the Christian Colleges to be the best media through which our regeneration can be brought about.

A few suggestions about the activities of the Board of Control in this respect would not be out of place. In the first place, the Board would have to establish Provincial Headquarters which would be in ready contact with the Christian Colleges in the several Provinces, and would send in their reports periodically to the Central Board; the Central Board may conveniently divide itself into three departments, Educational, Political (the word has a fear attached to it) and Religious. The Lindsay Commission recognised only one motive in regard to the Christian Colleges where we endorse a three-fold idea; the Commission regarded the existence of the colleges justified only in so far as they contributed to the furtherance of the Christian Church. This policy though pious, is not practical, nay it denies our community a political entity. On that ground, alone, this idea should be dismissed as deficient. Of the Central Departments of which I have written, attention of the reader is chiefly solicited for the political department. This department will have to convene all-India meetings, say twice a year or more; it will have to keep in touch with the Provincial headquarters which will send in details of conditions in the Provinces; besides this the Central department will maintain a political organ such as a weekly paper, and will issue pamphlets for village Christians during election time. In short this department must carry on all the business of a thorough-going political body. Language of this sort should not frighten anybody.

The things here suggested are practicable. If our resources are pooled it means increased efficiency at less cost. It means, above all, more power. It will be possible to maintain a press which will pay. The greatest difficulty about Christian Educational Finances at present, is the existence of a large number of separate colleges, all trying to run on their own. The big alteration which is needed is something which rests on well-tried principles of economics.

A very essential feature of the Board's Administration will be to appoint agents in every village who will provide records of the Christian population there. Thus it will not be possible for the Christians to be seduced away during election.

I have tried to show that the most urgent need dictated by the times in which we live is to create what I have called, a political personality, in the Christians of India. There may be a feeling that within the Christian Brotherhood, every member is equal to every other member in social status. This feeling, I believe, is at the root of the present condition of disintegration which is to be found among the Christians of every city. We refuse to recognise the important members of our brotherhood; each member is too much on his own dignity and is not willing to back the worthier ones, because they fail to see their own good in this process. For the sake of our political health, we must fight, not against anything material so much, as against a state of mind. Religious unity we may have, but political unity is entirely lacking. If we are to count for anything in the future of our land, our Political Personality must be one, and it must be brought to life. Otherwise we perish.

KARSANDAS MULJI—PIONEER AND PROPHET.*

(BY H. H. THE MAHARAJA GAEKWAR OF BARODA.)

How often in history has the struggle between prophet and priest been repeated! "I was neither a priest nor a leader," said the Hebrew Amos three thousand years ago—as he called his nation from religiosity to true religion. "I hate your abominations and your temple rituals: let justice flow down in an unfailing stream;" so he announced the oracle of God to a corrupt priesthood. So Jesus cried out against iniquity and priestcraft and all hypocrisy; and just so did the brave man we are met to honour, call upon religion to cleanse itself of shameful immorality.

Karsandas dared to shed the white light of truth upon their dark deeds, and to be out-casted by his own sect and family. Happy man! "Blessed are ye, when men shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for the sake of truth." So we may apply the beatitude of Jesus to him. We all know the story of how the young crusader won a great moral victory; and we also know that like all such victories it has to be pressed home; if the old abuses are not to raise their evil heads again. Trishna is indeed hydra-headed; and we must all carry on the work of this spiritual warrior against entrenched evil, which is often the corruption of the good.

Greed, lust and selfishness are rampant in many forms, and superstition dies hard; it has scriptural authority to keep it alive. What was nobly said on symbols, men have interpreted literally—what was meant literally, they have taken as mere symbolism. And our national life has suffered, till a leading politician—himself a Brahmin—said recently that if our marriage-laws are to be reformed and our family-life made healthy, we must make war on priests and Shastras. War is sometimes useful; but peaceful reform is far better. Evolution rather than revolution is our Indian way.

Let us help priests, institutions and writings to be true to their better selves. Bad practices must be fought! but this is best done by encouraging good ones. I have found in a long life-time that reform is best carried out, if it is done by releasing the truth from its bonds, awakening the dormant spirit, finding, if we can, the true meaning behind the false letter, reading the symbol aright. The Krishna stories are picture-language for the people: we cannot replace them; but literalism make them a hindrance: it may make them an evil.

It is time we insisted that those who have the care of souls are as carefully trained as those who care for the bodies of men. Who shall teach the teachers? May-be it is again time for us laymen to assert the true human values, and to get a better theology and ethic established in religious centres, and in training-schools of religion. Ought not all schools to be such centres of religion? Secularism is no solution of our problems.

Is it time for a restatement of Hinduism? "Feed the thin man, not the fat bull. Wed the woman to the man who is physically and mentally suited to her. Insist that life is good not evil. Educate young people in sex-hygiene and morality. See that women and children—roots of the great tree of life—are given a better chance of mental and moral sanity. Insist that each is an end in himself or herself, not a means." All these are ideals as yet unrealised. They are indeed not yet even accepted as ideals.

In the renaissance of our country, such men as Karsandas are pioneers as well as prophets; we must have reformation as well as renaissance. Let us honour them by carrying on their work, and following their example. The battle for the widows' rights is not yet won: nor that for a saner marriage-law: nor that for the education of girls.

Another aspect of Karsandas Mulji's brief life I must mention. He showed in his Satyaprakasha and elsewhere the enormous power of the press for such educational work. The force of mass-suggestion, day after day, on impressionable minds, men, women and children, who read little but the daily papers—what an incalculable power it is for good or evil! If the journalist is a jackal with a nose for offal, he can poison a nation; if he is one who thinks on what is noble and lovely and of good report, he becomes indeed a messenger of Light. Such was Karsandas and such are many journalists—thank God. But their task is a hard one, and we of the public alone can make them succeed, if we seek good and avoid evil in what we read day by day. Let me speak bluntly. The "yellow" press must be boycotted. Who would put poison daily on the breakfast-table of his family? And if the great battle of truth against falsehood, of peace against war, of justice against injustice, of love against lust, of sanity against madness—if this great crusade is to be won, we must have a press devoted to it. Otherwise man will destroy himself and our gains, so hardly won, will be lost. A sound press and a reformed religion—what a noble alliance might they not make in the service of humanity? As a servant of men, a prophet of pure religion, a champion of innocence, we honour Karsandas, journalist and friend of Truth. At great personal cost, he devoted his paper to noble but unpopular causes.

I have a great admiration for Karsandas as the pioneer in yet a third field. He was a fearless and consistent advocate of travel as a means of enriching our national life. Let us learn alike from East and West whatever we can. Insularity breeds weaklings. It is characteristic of this fearless man that he saw the need to break through the strange tabu against crossing "the black water." "All the earth is the Lord's," he said, "and therefore all is as sacred as our own soil." On the early travels of Indians he shed the light of truth, and proved that like so many strange inhibitions, this was of later growth. What harm these irrational tabus have done us, and how obstinate they are, largely because we have starved our women of true education! We feed them on superstition and breed ignorance. But now they are thinking for themselves, and are becoming free to be themselves, and they owe much to such pioneers as Karsandas.

He dared to think for himself on many grave questions; and when men do this and follow truth wherever it may lead them, they make history and set free new and life-giving energies. As a great thinker has said, "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." It is as a pioneer of freedom that Karsandas will remain in the memory and affection of India. It is clear that we have much still to do. Foreign travel is still in many quarters tabu. May I, therefore, add some practical reflections suggested by my own experience as a ruler? I have just enacted a law against caste-tyranny and Karsandas Mulji's life proves how strong that can be. In our age ex-communication is still common, and the pressure of caste is still tyrannical. Nor is the loss to our national life small in the inveterate hold of heredity. Men must do what they can do best, not simply what their fore-fathers have done. A Kshatriya is not necessarily a man of action, nor a Shudra necessarily fitted only for menial service. Let each rise to the fullest achievement of which he is by nature capable. In a word, much of our social Dharma is still far from democratic, and Karsandas was a pioneer also in this great spiritual movement for the free and unfettered growth of each individual within the society to which he belongs. The true test of a society is this: "Does it foster or thwart ability? Does it recognise or ignore the claims of personality? Does it set men and women free to achieve the best that is in them?" In helping to mould our social life on freer and more gracious patterns, Karsandas was an able and devoted apostle of freedom and truth. He is an immortal. Great men live on in the emulation which they inspire;

चलचलमिदं सर्वं कीर्तयेत्यस्य जीवति ॥

(The mind is fickle, fickle too is wealth; impermanent are life and youth, and all that moves and that is still: he lives and he alone, who wins immortal fame).

• Towards Dictatorship?—Following the Irish Senate's rejection of the bill banning the wearing of blue shirts, Mr. de Valera introduced in the Dail a bill to abolish the Senate as a constituent House of the Legislature.—

SANATAN DHARMA AND UNTOUCHABILITY.

(By T. R. VENKATARAMA SASTRI.)

The Vedic Religion is the religion of a comparatively homogeneous people and has points of contact with the religions of other well-known Aryan groups like the ancient Persians and Greeks. When the Indian polity was developed so as to include a vast indigenous population of the country within its religious and cultural fold, the Vedic religion itself underwent a change and in this changed form it has received the name of Hinduism. That is not our name for our religion. The word is derived from the name which the Persians gave to India as the country of the Sindhu river then known to them (H being the Persian equivalent for Sanskrit S). The mixed religion and culture have given us some peculiarities which are no part of the Vedic Religion but which naturally sprang from the situation in which we were placed. These peculiarities were of very slow growth. They did not come in a day. For example, take the idea of touch as pollution as it prevails in South India with which we are most intimately acquainted. No Brahmin will eat the food touched by a Sudra. According to modern orthodoxy there are no Kshatriyas or Vaishyas and the problem of accepting or rejecting the food touched by a Kshatriya or Vaishya does not arise. The result therefore is that an orthodox Brahmin will not, and cannot, eat food touched by a non-Brahmin. Apastamba, the puritan, who treats himself and even Svetaketu of the Upanishad and the White Yajus as persons of a far later age than the Vedas, lays down the rule that a non-Brahmin may cook the food of a Brahmin. If the Sudra cooked under the supervision of an Arya, it may be accepted straightway. If it is cooked by a Sudra without such supervision, the Brahmin can put the rice-pot over the fire and sprinkle water over it and it immediately becomes fit food for Gods and men.

Food brought by a slave at night may be eaten but not if brought by a woman-slave. There are also regulations as to how the Sudra cook should shave and dress. He ought to shave every day or at least twice a fortnight.

We have the Mahabharata telling us that Krishna preferred to stay with Vidura rather than accept the hospitality of Duryodhana. This is far earlier than Apastamba according to tradition.

If we come to the later Smritis we find slow refinements as to which Sudras may be accepted as permissible of touch, and which not, with a division into sai Sudras and asai Sudras. Roughly these were those who were in contact with the three higher castes in every-day life and those who were not. The non-Brahmin castes whose touch did not pollute varied in different parts of the country. The potter, the shepherd and the barber may touch according to some. The barber may not according to others.

The whole of our modern stricter notions developed as we gave up beef first and flesh food next and the classes, other than the Brahmin, retained flesh; and the necessity to take in non-brahman cooks possibly ceased by a comparatively growing Brahmin population.

This was helped also by another movement that made women cooks of the household. Of old women could learn Vedas just like men; they had initiation (upanayana) just the same as men. The Asura, that is, Parsi women to this day retain the corresponding Kusti ceremony. They performed the Gayatri ceremony (the daily morning and evening prayer). Slowly all this fell into desuetude. The women took charge of the household and their cooking and the preliminary throwing of a little rice into the household hearth became the substitute for her ancient fire worship in her own right. No longer were cooks needed; she made the kitchen clean. The ancient rule that no one should go into the kitchen and witness the uncleanness there was no longer required.

The Sutra prohibits two things much prized in these days as a symbol of purity, the cooking by women and the cooking for oneself. The Vaishnavas and the Madhwas still retain something of the first prohibition and prefer the man's (Acharya's) cooking; and the Smartas who prefer the new rule still treat the woman's cooking as requiring purification at a ceremony for the ancestors on the anniversary of their deaths.

All this will make clear that the touch purity or impurity is the resultant of two forces, one the reform of food and repugnance to flesh foods and flesh eaters and the other the availability of a new set of cooks more clean and acceptable.

Apart from this evolution of the ideas of touch purity or impurity we have actual injunctions in the Avesta of the Parsis and in our own scriptures that purity comes of the idea of cleanliness. The performer of a ceremony exercises extra care in regard to cleanliness but it is still cleanliness that he is after. In the ceremonies for the gods, the cloth may be accepted straightway from the washerman's hand but the ceremony for the manes of the ancestors demand stricter cleanliness.

My friend Mr. T. M. Krishnaswami Ayyar propounds the following view:

"By a system of untouchability (achara) starting with the members of the family and gradually extending beyond, sanatana dharma secures for its adherents the beneficent result of the contemplative solitude of the forest within the crowded activities of the social polity. No westerner unacquainted with the details of the social system or even the Hindu who has lived the life of anachara can ever appreciate the basic foundation of sanatana dharma on achara and anushthana. To mistake cleanliness for achara is to confess ignorance of Hinduism.

"Achara is not the product of the best washerman nor even the result of the most punctilious and careful disinfection. It is the making of a physical and mental isolation into which alone can be drawn the spiritual magnetism of the higher powers. If achara is once abolished the Hinduism which is essentially founded on sanatana dharma can only embellish the dead libraries of museums; its living results can no longer fertilise the minds of men."

In the first place the word achara is not untouchability in Sanskrit; the secondary meaning attached to it in Tamil has led to this hasty expression of view. The word Acharya in Tamil, is really s'uchi in Sanskrit which means clean; as'uchi means unclean; Asaucha means uncleanness. The touch of one in asaucha due to death or birth is unclean. According to ancient ideas partides go out of the unclean man's body and find lodging in the body of another who is thereby made unclean. In the Ramayana the rishi asks the disciple to give him the bathing cloth because the water of the Tamasa is clean or clear like the mind of a good man. It is the cleaning effect of the bath and its value as a preparation for holy duties that is aimed at and he therefore prefers it even to the Ganges. The connection between cleanliness and godliness and holiness is an ancient conception and feeling.

The idea is cleanliness. At any rate its origin in cleanliness cannot be denied. The development to-day of that idea has gone into unhealthy and morbid lengths. I have seen women coming from the river with a pot of clean water going back and entering the river again for a purifying bath because they had trodden on a bit of broken pot or a thread of cloth on the way. I have seen a man purchasing oil in the shop in his own vessel dipping the vessel carefully in water up to the neck because the shop-keeper touched the vessel. I give these illustrations because the ancient common sense prescribed the washing of the leg in the one case and stated it to be no pollution in the other that the vessel was touched by the shop-keeper. Still there can be no doubt if the mind, is disturbed by the idea of pollution the only means of purification is that which the mind itself requires.

The most important point however is that the achara (untouchability?) was intended neither to reproduce the conditions of the forest nor to produce any physical or mental isolation as a condition of drawing to oneself any magnetism.

On the other hand it seems to me that it exemplifies the extravagances and dangers of the cultivation of an exclusive sense of purity. In this as in other matters, moderation and the recognition of the value of a sense of proportion and the adoption of a middle course will be found to be valuable.

The ultimate aim is the clearness or cleanliness of the mind. The ancients recognising the difficulties of life achieved the balance of mind by not going into the kitchen and contracting a repugnance for the food prepared in the not quite clean conditions there, and by purifying the food by the faith that they had in their own power of imposing purity on the food and in the resistance of their highly disciplined constitution. That was not in all cases possible and purification was necessary but the desire for purification might easily become morbid if it saw uncleanness every where and tried to erect a wall around itself for protection against the contaminations of the outside world.

In another sphere also we see the same slowly growing exclusiveness. In Manu the most ancient Smriti under the mixed polity, the Brahmin was allowed to marry from all the four castes. In Yajnavalkya we have the repugnance to accept a wife from the Sudra class. Even in Manu's time, opinions on the mixture of classes were not uniform. Some considered acceptance of a Sudra wife as itself degrading; others considered the reproduction of himself in such wife degrading; and still others deemed his having no children except through such wife alone as irredeemably degrading. These views were based both on a theory of eugenics and on the duty of attaining immortality in the continued existence of himself in worthy descendants in the world under the Sun. Slowly with the new theory of no kshatriyas or vaisyas in this age, marriage within the caste came to be established and that strengthened the new conception of purity.

Thus progressively accumulating consequences of changes in life produced the extreme conception now claimed to be the basic truth of Sanatana dharma, and that in a sense which it does not bear.

I must take leave of this topic about untouchability as of the essence of Hindu Religion and note one peculiarity. Since the days of the three great acharyas, Sankara, Ramanuja and Madhwa there has been no great religious movement in the South. Whatever Sankara may have intended, his movement has fostered a certain intellectualism and attachment to strict Smriti traditional observances. It is not reformative in tendency. Its iconoclasm was in that high altitude of speculative philosophy that its influence on conduct was easily put aside by a division of truths into those that apply to the work-a-day (vyavaharika) world and those that did not.

Ramanuja's system had more place for emotion and his followers made attempts to uplift the lower classes in the social scale. It is difficult to say that Madhwa-chariar's bhakti school had the same urge of social uplift. Ramanuja's which had the most stress on uplifting social service by carrying the redemptive message to the depressed and the lowly, suffered by the overshadowing predominance of the Smarta School. It is ever the way in the contact of diverse Schools. The weaker in influence—not necessarily the weaker in intrinsic quality, but the weaker in the place and at the time—grows apologetic and conformist by a process of interpretation. And there is also the familiar fact that on the death of acharyas with a new message the next generation slide back and interpret away the saving truth. The result is that so far as the south is concerned it has become intellectualistic and untouched by the higher human emotion. While the north has thrown out reform movements stressing human equality and the value of social service, the south has remained self-satisfied, in love with its appraisalment of its own higher purity and contemplating with satisfaction on its own uncontaminated isolation. And the west coast has carried it to the logical extreme bordering on insane obsession. Probably the longer contact with foreign religions and the greater exposure to their powerful challenge which the north has had also accounts for the greater aliveness and reaction to the challenge to be found in the north.

The south is so self-satisfied that it has actually located the next coming avatar in South India and in the Southernmost part of it, farthest away from the impure north.

Orthodoxy claims that it is not the less intent on uplifting the lower classes but it only objects to the misguided agitation for temple entry. I would ask orthodoxy to look into its own heart and consider—there is no denying the truth when we are alone in the presence of the Eternal Witness—whether it is not true that we have never lifted a little finger to purify or uplift the untouchables and we do not intend to do any work in that direction and as soon as the present danger is averted we propose to go into slumber again until the next wave of agitation should come, whenever that may be.

We can purify. We can uplift. The way was shown by Ramanuja though many even of his followers now disown his way. If we followed it, there will be no untouchable left in the land. There will be no untouchable recognisable as such. I am charging nobody with any sin for the present state of things. But we shall be guilty of sin if we recognised the duty of uplift and yet refused to discharge it. Those who had achieved their highest philosophy while they were still beef-eaters and evolved the modern purity out of the beef-eating and drink-sodden conditions of earlier days can purify the Harijan class equally.

Is there any dharma or justice or purity or good sense in treating these as untouchables while they remain Hindus and abolishing untouchability as soon as they become Christian or Muslim? You dare not do to the Christian or the Muslim what you do to the Hindu. It is a desire for self protection and a sense of helplessness that accounts for the difference of treatment. I personally feel it shameful that we should not ourselves raise them to a state of cleanliness and abolish untouchability.

Those who see nothing but a political stunt in the movement to abolish untouchability do not see truly or far. Moreover 'as I said on another occasion, citing from Mazzini, every political question soon becomes a social question and next a religious question.

I am not concerned with the changes of view on the part of any single individual nor with the errors or blunders of any political leader. I am aware that there is a great deal to be said against legislation as a method of introducing a change in the social outlook of people.

Nor is it my intention to commend the resuscitations of old institutions. They are gone never to return in their old forms. Newer ideas and appropriate changes are in progress. They cannot be prevented. They are going on under our eyes even in orthodox households. That the conception of untouchability is an essential part of our Sanatana Dharma or that it is the most valuable idea that Hinduism has evolved in the course of its variegated history is neither right nor conducive to the vital reactions of its inner life which it must establish if its influence is not to decay and die.

"GOVERNMENT BY THE MAJORITY— DEMOCRACY."

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

My esteemed friend, Mrs. Pitt of Cambridge, has done well to elucidate the working of British Democracy with reference to Indian Reforms. It is sadly true as she points out, that there is 'distrust,' 'resentment' and 'disappointment' in the Indian political mind. These have their origin not in its mistaking the philosophy or process of working or the system, but in the suggestion that an outside authority such as an alien Parliament alone is the arbiter of India's destiny. The British democracy is itself now an uncertain quantity and what is really humiliating to the Indian political thinker is that he is required to take consolation in the chance that the die-hard opposition may not come into power to up-set the 'White-Paper.' What more, its authors themselves do not seem to believe in what is claimed to be best for it; for, do we not see that some of its sponsors, when openly attacked by those of the Churchillian group that the national Government of the day is allowing India to slip out of its fingers—hastening to placate and pacify it with an aside wink of the eye that after all there is nothing to be alarmed at in the provisions of the new scheme hedged in, as they are, with all sorts of safeguards more than drowning the poor semblance of freedom which it is made to hold out?

With Dominion Status ruled out, a discerning Indian feels it derogatory to his self-respect to reconcile himself to what is admittedly an ugly scheme or the philosophy of democracy which champions it. The average Briton conscious of having worked for the upliftment of India for a century and a half may well set this attitude of mind down to sheer ingratitude.

But he must remember that 'wanting to be free and wanting to love' are two of the most over-powering human sensations imperious in their nature, which in their on-rush clean sweep away all sentiments of gratitude lurking even in out of the way odd corners of the mind.

India wants to be free and this is perhaps the greatest achievement of the British Rule. Would its Democracy disclaim it?

Penukonda,
March 30, 1934.

Yours etc,
T. SIVASANKARAN.

THE AIM OF CHRISTIAN MISSIONS.

Last week we spoke regarding India's Christian Colleges. This is a question that is bound to become more and more difficult unless the aims and purposes of these colleges are clearly stated and understood. We tried to speak a word in support of the right of each one to give an open-minded consideration to religious teachings. We claim that right for all. If we insist that Christians must be free to study religious teachings wherever they find them, we insist equally that this right must be given to every other one whatever his faith or race may be. This is the basis of our claim to the right to present the teachings of Jesus to those who wish to know regarding them.

Referring to the aim of the Christian College we said that it is not simply to turn the people of India from their ancestral faiths. This was in reply to the statement in the Social Reformer (reproduced on page 9 in the same issue, March 8, 1934) which reads:—".....the primary object of these institutions (Christian Colleges) is to substitute Christianity for the ancient religious faiths of the country." And we said that even in our most positive evangelistic efforts we do not aim at turning anyone from his ancestral faith.

This statement has been interpreted by some to indicate a lack of positive aim in Christian evangelism. The following letter has been received:—

B. C. M. S. MISSION COMPOUND
MIRZAPUR.

To the Editor,

The article headed "India's Christian Colleges" in the issue of the Indian Witness dated March 8th 1934, contains a very bold statement concerning the aim of Christian missions which I beg to question.

I am amazed to read that "Christian missions in their most positive evangelistic efforts do not aim at turning anyone from his ancestral faith. Certainly such a programme would be opposed to the whole spirit and teaching of Jesus." (para 5) Such a statement means that many missionaries are working contrary to the teaching of the Master Who called them.

We, together with missionaries of the U. P. Punjab, and N. W. F. P., are just concluding the "Evangelistic Campaign Week," during which we have been selling Gospel portions, and witnessing to the power of Christ and His Salvation. Our main aim in this "positive evangelistic effort" has been to win men and women for Christ; and naturally expect that as they confess loyalty and allegiance to the Saviour, so they will turn from those ancestral faiths which have not satisfied them in their search for God.

If we as missionaries believe that "Neither is their salvation in any other; nor there is other Name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved." (Acts 4:12), then we must, in effect, endeavour to turn men from those beliefs which do not lead to Jesus Christ. To "make disciples of all the nations" according to the Master's command is certainly not a "programme opposed to His spirit and teaching."

(Sd.) SAMUEL R. BURGOWNE.

We are happy to present this letter of Rev. S. R. Burgowne if there is any need to call attention again to the position we hold in regard to Christian evangelism. That position is admirably expressed by Mr. Burgowne, "Our main aim in this 'positive evangelistic effort,' has been to win men and women for Christ." That is our aim always. Reference in the letter is then made to what we may "naturally expect" to follow, a confession of "loyalty and allegiance to the Saviour." Well and good; but these expectations may differ very widely and why should they be confused with our central aim which is that men and women should come to a personal experience of fellowship with Jesus? Most of us expect that Christian baptism will follow a confession of allegiance to Jesus. But our Quaker brethren do not baptize. And among ourselves we differ as to what baptism represents. There are those among us who "naturally expect" a certain type of Confirmation to follow. Others do not.

What we desire is that all may come to know Jesus. We are willing to let 'our main aim' end there. We know in our own heart of hearts that all will be well with any one who gives the Holy Spirit full sway. St. Paul knew this and said "Wherefore if any man is in Christ, he is a new creature; the old things are passed away; behold they are become new."

THE PROPOSED UNIVERSITY AT SARNATH.

The Maha-Bodhi publishes a scheme for an International Buddhist University as drawn by the Dhammapala Memorial Committee, appointed last October for the purpose, as well as the recommendations of the Memorial Committee. According to the decision of the Memorial Committee the scheme, given below, will be placed in the hands of lawyers for the purpose of securing its registration. While presenting the fruit of many long deliberations to the public, the Maha-Bodhi seeks their co-operation in realizing the ideal of the International Buddhist University at Sarnath.

The Dhammapala Memorial Committee has decided that an International Buddhist University at Sarnath will be the best means of realizing the object for which the Committee was appointed. For various reasons, mainly financial, such a University cannot be founded immediately. It is not also possible for the Committee to draw up a detailed scheme regarding the character and functions of that educational institution. The Committee believes that if a working constitution is framed for the purpose, it may be entrusted with taking such steps as may be deemed necessary for bringing the University into existence at an early date. The respective duties of the different parts of the constitution will have to be defined as clearly as possible, so that they can work smoothly and harmoniously towards a common goal. The Dhammapala Memorial Committee fully realizes the difficulty which such a constitution will have to confront in dealing with a full-fledged University if and when it actually comes into being, for the Committee is unable at this stage to anticipate all the varied requirements of an international educational centre and to devise a comprehensive constitution suited to it. But one thing can be done to remedy the inherent defect of a scheme which in its details is not based on facts of experience. The constitution drawn up by the Committee is intended to work provisionally for a period of five years, after which it shall have to revise the whole situation, alter or modify itself in such a manner as to prove a more efficient instrument in carrying out the functions of the University with its foundations well laid in the meanwhile. The constitution shall, of course, be free to take such measures within the limits of the power bestowed on it as are dictated by the exigencies of administration during this tentative period, but no wholesale change shall be allowed.

The Committee is of opinion that the proposed University should promote not only Buddhistic studies but also studies in scientific subjects which may be considered to have the greatest bearing on the positive good of humanity, instead of taking up all such subjects to which equal attention cannot be given. Whether or not other subjects besides those mentioned above should be included is a matter that is proposed to be left entirely in the hands of the Constitution.

The ultimate ideal of this University is to advance the cause of human progress and to benefit mankind through the sympathetic and broad-minded exposition of Buddhism by bringing out in particular such of its elements as are best calculated to further the attainment of this goal.

CONSTITUTION.

A. The International University is to have a President at its head and one or more Vice-Presidents to help him. The President is to preside over all meetings of the Governing Body, and, in his absence, either a Vice-President or any of the members present. The Governing Body shall be constituted as follows—It shall have 108 Members excluding the President and the Vice-Presidents. The Governing Body which is to function immediately shall be formed by the Dhammapala Memorial Committee and is to consist as far as possible of representative Buddhists or non-Buddhists, interested in Buddhism, not only from India but also from other countries, such as Ceylon, Burma, Siam, China, Japan, Cambodia, Tibet, Hawaii and Eastern Archipelago, also Europe and America. This Governing Body shall have a General Secretary, two Secretaries and a Treasurer, at present to be appointed by the Dhammapala Memorial Committee, but in case of resignation etc. to be elected by the Governing Body.

As it will not be possible for a Body constituted on such a wide basis by Members belonging to remote countries to meet in full strength for the conduct of business, it will be necessary to form a smaller committee consisting of 25 Members who will be able to carry on the function of the Governing Body in Calcutta or Sarnath. This Committee may be called the Working Committee of the Governing Body. The office-bearers of the Governing Body are also to act in their respective capacities on this Committee.

The Governing Body shall determine the broad principles of administration regarding the International Buddhist University. At the initial stage this shall have to be done largely by means of correspondence. It is expected that the Members of the Governing Body will keep themselves in touch with the intellectual, and spiritual movements in their own countries and will communicate their views to the General Secretary regarding the policy that should shape the activities of the University. For the convenience of business a questionnaire may be drawn up by the Working Committee and sent to the different members of the Governing Body inviting their opinions and suggestion. The results of such correspondence are in due course to be placed before the Working Committee and suitable action to be taken thereon. Details of management shall have to be settled by the Working Committee. It is to be understood however, that in this matter there must not be any deviation from the general policy and principles already accepted by the Committee in the name of the Governing Body after proper deliberations on the reports submitted by the Members of the latter Body in response to the questionnaire.

Membership of the Governing Body shall be restricted to those who are prepared to accept the fundamental creed of the University as set forth in the Memorandum, and who: besides, possess educational as well as administrative experience. Any vacancy is to be filled up by election from amongst the general constituency of the University to be described hereafter.

B. One of the main functions of the University shall be to advance the cause of Research in various spheres of Buddhist Culture. This function can be entrusted most satisfactorily to a learned body to be styled The Academy of the International Buddhist University of which it shall form an integral part. The Academy shall consist of seventy-five scholars to be chosen by the Dhammapala Memorial Committee. These scholars are to be designated as Fellows of The Academy of The International Buddhist University. In matters relating to the purely educational side of the University this Academy is to work in co-operation with the Governing Body. When the Academy and the Governing Body meet together to discuss such matters the President of the Governing Body or any of the Vice-Presidents or in their absence any member from amongst those present elected to the Chair, shall guide the deliberations on such occasion. The Academy shall otherwise be independent of the Governing Body. By educational matters referred to above are meant selection of text-books, determination of curricula, publication of lectures, etc. The Fellows may be requested to carry on researches in subjects to be selected by themselves and to deliver courses of lectures embodying the results of their investigations at least thrice a year, at present, at any educational centre (preferable at the Buddhist Viharas, Calcutta and Sarnath.) The Fellows will intimate subjects of their lectures etc., for communication to the Press. The Committee shall undertake to publish notices in the newspapers. The Fellows shall receive no remuneration for their work. In case of resignation etc., the Academy shall have the power to co-opt. The Dhammapala Memorial Committee in electing Fellows of the Academy shall consider the question of fitness for the honour as a determining factor. Persons connected with educational institutions, who have already been recipients of Research Degrees or those who have qualified themselves by their work shall alone be considered deserving of the honour. The Academy shall have a Secretary who besides carrying on the duties of a Fellow, shall perform the office-work connected with the Academy with the help of assistants, and shall also maintain the contact of the Academy with the Governing Body in matters already described.

Lectures delivered by the Fellows shall be published either as bulletins or in a Journal of the University as the cost of the University.

C. The General Constituency of the University shall consist of a body of members, who must be either graduates of recognized Universities, or Buddhist Monks or other sympathisers with the cause of Buddhism who shall be considered as being suitable to be such members by the Governing Body. Annual Fee for an ordinary member may be fixed at Rs. 10. Any member paying Rs. 100/- or upwards at the time of admission is to be treated as a life-member. Advantages: Use of the Libraries at the Buddhist Viharas (Calcutta and Sarnath). To receive the bulletins or the Journal of the University. To fill any vacancy on the Governing Body by election.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Enlightened Imperialism:—At the second quinquennial meeting of the Fascist regime, 7,000 leading Fascists thronged the opera house and thunderously cheered Mussolini who assigned expansion in Africa as a task for future generations of Italians. "There is no question of territorial conquest but let not the nations in possession block the spiritual and economic expansion of Fascist Italy." Signor Mussolini, while stressing the need of an outlet for Italy in Africa, also referred to the possibilities of collaboration with Asia and pointed out that both could be reached from Italy in a few hours by sea, still fewer by air. Appealing that the significance of the aim which he was confiding to the present and future Italian generations should not be misunderstood, he emphasised again that it was not a question of territorial conquest but of natural expansion leading to collaboration between Italy and the people of Africa and Eastern nations. It was a question of action which will make available innumerable resources of the two continents especially Africa and carry them more profoundly into the cycle of world civilization.

In the Second Year:—The four-year campaign for the betterment of Germany undertaken by Herr Hitler has resulted in the reduction of Germany's unemployed by nearly one-third in the past year. The second year's offensive against unemployment was opened by the Chancellor on March 21. "An allotment of 1,000 million marks to conquer unemployment was announced by Herr Hitler in a speech at a lonely spot between Munich and the Austrian Frontier to the men engaged in roadworks. The speech, which was the last of the series in commemoration of his accession to power, was made in presence of most of the Cabinet members and broadcast throughout the nation. All the workers in the country stopped work for an hour and a half to hear Herr Hitler. All cities and villages were beflagged. Herr Hitler declared that Government intended to marry at least 8,00,000 girls this year and 150 millions marks would be appropriated to matrimonial loans. Six hundred million marks would be spent in roadmaking and 800 millions given for taxation and loan certificates. Herr Hitler in conclusion appealed to the other nations to realise the Germany desired "nothing except in freedom and peace to contribute towards creating a better world."

The Karsandas Centenary:—The speakers at the Karsandas Mulji Centenary meeting in Bombay were served with notices by the Solicitors of the Managing Committee of the Shrimad Vaishnava Parishad. They wrote:—"We have to address you on behalf of the managing Committee of the Shrimad Vaishnava Parishad. It appears from the local papers that you are one of the speakers at the Karsandas Mulji centenary celebration which is being held to-day at the Sir Cawasji Jehangir Hall. Our clients are jealous for the memory of the Shrimad Vallabhcharya and reverence his doctrines and precepts. They instruct us to state that if you have studied the life of Shrimad Vallabhcharya and his teachings, you cannot but express your admiration for them. On the other hand if you are not conversant with his life and ideals they wish us to request you to refrain from making any reference to their teacher and his doctrines in any manner calculated to throw ridicule upon him or them or to hurt the religious feelings of his followers among whom our clients say they are proud to enroll themselves."

Honour from Persia:—The Associated Press understands that a unique honour has been conferred on Mr. Mohammed Ishaque, lecturer of the Calcutta University, by the Persian Government for his services in the cause of Persian Language and Literature. It is stated that the Ministry of Education, Persia, have confirmed a resolution intending to award a 'Nishan-i-Imi' (Medal in token of Learning), the first to be given to an Indian. Three other distinguished scholars, all Persian, have also received this medal. Prof. Ishaque was granted leave by the Calcutta University in 1931 to tour throughout Persia and he stayed there for six months visiting among other places Teheran, Ishapahan, Shiraz and Resht (Capital of Gilan) and also Kirmanshaha. He has been connected with the Calcutta University for the last eight years prior to which he was a Professor of Persian in the Dacca University.

NOTES

Propagation and Propaganda:—It is surprising that the Dnyanodaya, the organ of six Missions, should exhort its constituents to take a leaf out of the books of Stalin, Mussolini, Kemal Pasha and Hitler. We had better quote its words: "One of the lessons that Christians may learn from our present world-scene is the power of propaganda. Stalin in Russia, Mussolini in Italy, Kemal Pasha in Turkey, and Hitler in Germany, all stand for the power of ideas. By reiteration and colorful presentation, these men have led powerful nations into new paths..... Coercion there has been, but behind the coercion is the contagious enthusiasm of new programmes." Our respectful congratulations to our contemporary for wrenching itself free from the prejudice against these men as enemies of religion. Historically, however, they were not the first to discover the uses of propaganda. All the nations engaged in the War lavishly resorted to propaganda much of which is now acknowledged to have been downright lying. Christian Missionaries themselves have carried on propaganda against non-Christian religions. Propagating truth is one thing and carrying propaganda in its name, is quite another. The great world Teachers hated propaganda. Jesus invariably bade those whom he healed to tell no man. Indian religious teachers firmly held that whenever a man was ripe for their teaching he would seek them out and that only harm will ensue by their going out into the market place in search of disciples. The success of the four dictators referred to by the Dnyanodaya was due initially to the collapse of the systems which preceded them. It is premature to speak of their success. For our part, we think that it would have been infinitely better for the countries concerned as also for the world if these leaders, whose patriotism and integrity we never doubted, had reformed the old systems instead of overturning them. There are signs that they are beginning to realise the importance of establishing continuity with the past as the surest means of ensuring permanence for whatever is of abiding value in their reforms.

Christian Colleges and Government:—The Guardian of Madras is a journal which by its straightforward and independent thinking has established for itself a place among the formative influences of Indian journalism. We are pained to see that its writings, particularly the latest (March 22), on the Reformer's protest against the participation of the Viceroy and the Secretary of State for India in an appeal for funds to reorganise Christian Colleges on the lines of the Lindsay Commission's Report, fall far short of expectations. We have made our protest. We said in our very first article that we did not expect it to have any effect. It has had none. The Archbishop of Canterbury quoted in his speech at the Mansion House meeting from a letter from the Viceroy that "the Christian Colleges of India have done most valuable work in the past in producing loyal and well trained and disciplined citizens (which, by the way, Jesus and his disciples were far from being.—Ed.) There is much we can write on the text furnished by the Viceroy but for the present we are content with the brief parenthesis. There are one or two points of fact on which the Guardian is not well-informed. The first is a historical one. The affirmation of religious neutrality in the Queen's Proclamation, which we reprinted last week, was not, as the Guardian thinks, made with reference to the policy of previous rulers, which, with occasional deviations, has been the traditional policy of Hindu and Muslim rulers since Asoka's time. It was made with reference to the principal immediate cause of the Indian Mutiny which was the belief among Indian soldiers that Government contemplated converting its Hindu and Muslim subjects to Christianity. The Guardian may consult the pages of Lord Roberts' "Forty-one years in India" dealing with the causes of the Mutiny. The evolution of policy towards Christian Missions is traced by a hand entirely favourable to them in Mr. Mayhew's book on the subject. The obligation of the Government of India to protect all religions equally is embodied in the Indian Penal Code and is not open to speculation. The official intervention of the Viceroy and Ministers of State in this matter, is more likely to prejudice than to promote the true interests of the Christian Colleges as an integral part of Indian Education.

Public School for Parsis :—It is stated that the buildings of the Deccan College in Poona, which Government have decided to abolish as a measure of retrenchment, have been purchased by Parsis who intend to establish a Public School for their children on the English model. The English Public School is an offshoot of the English social system which almost till the War remained intact. The basic principle of the system was the division of its members into (1) the class which gave orders and (2) the class which took them. The so-called Public Schools are really private and exclusive institutions for the children of the first class. They did not aim at producing scholars but at producing officers for the Army and Navy and the Diplomatic and Civil services and administrators in the Asiatic and African dependencies of Britain. The English Public School since the war has been losing its importance owing to the rapid transformation which the English social system is undergoing. The tradition of English Public School men constituting the ruling class, temporarily broken by Disraeli, has been finally discarded. Bonar Law, Lloyd George and Ramsay Macdonald, even Asquith, were not public school men. In his "War Memories" Mr. Lloyd George says that Bonar Law and he were outsiders in the Asquith Cabinet and had, therefore, a kind of secret sympathy with each other, and that Asquith, although he began with the same disadvantages as themselves, liked to think of himself as one of the ruling class but, in fact, was at ease with neither. That was the transitional stage. The legend about the formation of 'character' as the special merit of the English Public School, is also thinning with the discovery that 'character' consists of many qualities which are not the monopoly or the predominant characteristic of English Public School men. The 'character' which is needed to control a far flung Empire is on the face of it not the 'character' which will benefit a community which is a microscopic minority in a dependent country. It is significant that the best-known English Public School man in Indian politics, is undergoing imprisonment for sedition. We believe that the Parsis have a future in this country as promising as that of any other community but the qualities of a dominant class which the English Public Schools are designed to foster, will prove to be rather a hindrance than a help in achieving that future. The immediate problem for the Parsee Community is how to avert the effect of a social complex in which "wealth accumulates and men decay."

A Novel Argument :—A "Special Correspondent" has explained at great length in the Times of India why British officers should continue to command in Indian regiments for many years to come. Everybody knows why. But the Special Correspondent has found a special reason. It is that "we have not got in India, as we have in England, a large supply of young men with long traditions of leadership in the army behind them." Shortly after the War an Indian officer who had been in France with his regiment of Rajputs from an Indian State, was telling us of his experiences. One of these has a bearing on the observation of the Special Correspondent. He said that he was found fault with by British officers for moving familiarly with his non-commissioned officers and men. His answer was that these men were of his own clan, some of them near relatives, and it would be preposterous for him to treat them as the British officer treats his men—it would not be tolerated. He added that the Australians who were also quartered in the same locality made fun of the British "tradition." Except the German junkers, there is no class with a "tradition" of command in modern armies outside Britain. In fact, such a thing is impossible in any national army as distinguished from a mercenary one. There is no hereditary class of officers in the French Army. There the tradition is that every private carries a Marshal's baton in his knapsack. The Soviet Army, of course, does not recognise such distinctions. In India itself, not only Rajputs but Brahmans and Banias and even women have led armies to battle. The fact is, fighting and killing one's enemies is a very primitive instinct and, as Melbourne said of the Order of the Garter, there is no damned merit about it. When a man undertakes to enlighten Indian opinion he might at least condescend to acquaint himself at least with the rudiments of Indian history. Another curious argument is that Indian troops in the War did better when led by British than by Indian officers. So far as there is truth in this statement it is entirely due to the present system which is designed to exalt the British officer above his Indian colleague in the estimation of the men. There have been also cases in which British troops were badly led by British officers.

Nemesis in History :—The Treaty signed a few days ago between Italy, Hungary and Austria by which the two former countries guarantee the independence of Austria, is the climax of a series of events which go to establish that there is Nemesis at work in history. Less than a century ago Hungary and Italy were groaning under the overlordship of Austria. The former managed to get itself recognised as an equal partner of the Austrian Empire. Attempts to have the grievances of the Italian people redressed were put down with ruthless severity. General Haynau's flogging of women in Lombardy so horrified British public opinion that when the General shortly after visited England he was thrashed by an infuriated crowd within an inch of his life. Austria was forced to withdraw from Italy in 1863, and later she accepted Italy as an Ally. Now both the German

MARY OF NAZARETH.*

The attitude of Jesus to his mother is a source of perplexity to the Indian student of the Gospels. There are but four references to her after she gave birth to him. The first is, when missing the boy, Jesus, when he was twelve years old, on their way home from the Temple at Jerusalem, they returned to find him disputing with the Rabbis. Then Mary asked him: "Son, why hast thou thus dealt with us; behold thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing." Jesus' reply is a snub. He asked: "How is it that ye sought me? wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" All the same, he went down with them and came to Nazareth and was subject unto his parents. But his words rankled in the mother's heart. "She kept all these sayings in her heart." The next reference to Mary is in the account of the marriage feast at Cana. Eighteen years had passed and Jesus had come to be recognised as a miracle worker. His mother was there and Jesus and his disciples had also been invited. The hosts confide to her that they have run short of wine. She communicated the information to her son. Jesus snubbed her: "Woman what have I to do with thee?" She quietly ignored the snub and told the servants of the house, "whatsoever he sayeth unto you do it." She knew that her son, though he resented her interference, would do what she wanted him to do. He converts water into wine. The third occasion is when Mary and her other sons—she had four—sought an interview with him at Capernaum which he had made his headquarters at the height of his popularity. "While he yet talked to the people, behold his mother and his brethren stood without, desiring to speak with him. Then one said unto him, Behold thy mother and brethren stand without, desiring to speak with thee. But he answered and said unto him that told him, Who is my mother? Who are my brethren? and he stretched forth his hand toward his disciples, and said, Behold my mother and brethren!" The crowd, no doubt, applauded this hit, but the mother's heart was wounded to the core. It was a public repudiation of his mother and brothers. The brothers after that ceased to trouble themselves about Jesus. But the mother was not to be estranged even by this public insult. She followed him to the foot of the Cross. All his disciples had deserted him, even John the beloved.

Even a torchlight and a voice,
The sudden Roman faces, violent hands,
And fear of what the Jews might do! Just that,
And it is written, "I forsook and fled."
John was ashamed and accompanied Mary to the foot of the Cross. "When Jesus saw his mother and the disciple standing by, whom he loved, he sayeth unto his mother, "Woman, behold thy son! Then sayeth he to the disciple, Behold thy mother, And from that hour that disciple took her into his own home."

The exaltation of the Mother of Christ by the Roman Church is directly contrary to the attitude of Jesus to her as it appears from these authentic utterances. The Protestant relegation of her to a position of irrelevance to Christianity is in entire consonance with it. Neither the Catholic nor the Protestant attitude, however, brings out the real tragedy of Mary's life. This is what Mary Borden has done with brilliant effect in her "Mary of Nazareth." It is a heart-breaking book. The story of the mother torn between her loyalty to her ancestral faith in which and in whose institutions she implicitly believed, and her love—which was indeed her life—for her first-born son who was in violent antagonism to the accepted interpretation of it by the established authorities whom he defied even in small matters, is told with a simplicity and sincerity which carries conviction in every page. Mary's difficulties with her sons with whom she lived—one of them, James, was a Pharisee of the straightest type and the others were worldly men who bitterly resented the notoriety which the eccentricities, as they regarded them, of their eldest brother brought on the family, are depicted in moving detail and with poignant insight. Mary had also two daughters, both married. They do not figure much in the story except that it is made clear that they had no sympathy with the dangerous vagaries of their illustrious brother. The High Priest of the Jews of Nazareth is a fine gentleman. He is full of sympathy for Mary but public feeling is too strong against Jesus and he is forced to order the fearful rite of excommunication by blast of trumpet in every synagogue in the land. It is not Jesus alone but the whole family which comes under the ban. The attempt to stave off the calamity by bringing Jesus home if necessary by force—the family's visit to Capernaum was undertaken with that object, one of the brothers had a stout rope tied round his waist under his coat to bind Jesus if he resisted—is frustrated by the crowds which surrounded Jesus and prevented access to him. Perhaps, he knew what his mother and brothers had come for, when he refused to see them.

As a last resource, Mary goes alone to have a heart to heart talk with her son. When she after much wanderings reaches the house, he is not there, and Mary of Magdala who is in charge comes forward to greet affectionately the mother of her Master. Mary of Nazareth shrinks with horror at sight of the Magdalene and flies precipitately from her presence. Of all Jesus' doings his association with Mary of Magdala was most detestable in his mother's eyes. She could tolerate everything but that. But such is the strength of her love for him that she eventually comes to regard Mary as her sole prop in her agony of grief.

* Publisher, Holtmann; Price 7s. 6d.

The most poignant scene in the story is that on the road to Calvary. The trial had lasted far into the night and in the small hours of the morning, Mary, her sister and her husband, and Mary of Magdala with the boy, Mark, denied admission to the tribunal, had been waiting for hours to see Jesus pass to the place of execution. Mary's brother-in-law begs her to go home and have some rest—they had been out all night. But she would not leave the spot. "Go and take Mark with you and send him to tell me if you hear anything of importance, and you, my sister, go and rest. Mary of Magdala will stay with me." The author does not seem to believe in the words attributed to Jesus on the Cross. Perhaps, John was not above interpolating into the story something which reflected glory upon himself. What passed in the mind of Jesus when he saw his mother? Let the author speak:

John, the very young disciple, had found his way to the cross and stood there with Mary, the mother of Jesus. Did he see them? Did he speak to them? They thought that he did. They said so afterwards. And perhaps it was true that Jesus, through eyes glassy with agony, saw the young boy clinging to his mother, and remembered his own boyhood when he had been so happy and so loved. Indeed in those awful moments he must have remembered everything from the beginning. All his life must have passed before him and all his childhood come back to him, and it seemed as he hung there that he was glad to know that this young boy would be son to his mother who had not believed in him yet had not failed him to the last.

INDIAN CHRISTIANS AND POLITICS.

Under the Communal Award the Indian Christian community was allotted a certain number of seats in the legislatures. An influential section of the community, however, felt at the time that it could best contribute to the national life by abjuring special communal constituencies and meetings were held where resolutions favouring general electorates were adopted. That there is a growing feeling in that community that there has been hitherto neglect of the political life of the country is shown by Mr. K. N. Dutt's article on "The Unification of Indian Christians" in the last issue of the Reformer. Mr. Dutt regards the religious and educational life of Christians adequately cared for and asks his communalists to concentrate their attention on the political problem which he conceives to be the most urgent today. Mr. Dutt fails to see that the religious disunity of the Indian Christians is at and Austrian Empires have ceased to exist and Austria has to seek the protection of Italy against Germany. The signing of the Treaty disestablishing the German Empire in the very Hall in which it was established sixty-five years ago, the overthrow of the Tsarist regime and the massacre of the Tsar and his family by the Soviet revolutionaries, and other incidents tend to the same conclusion: All oppression has implicit in it its own reprisals.

the bottom of their political disunity. The various Western sects of Christianity have been introduced with embellishments into India, and the fact that the alien mission boards are the controlling bodies tends to divide the converts into almost water-tight compartments. While the missionary regards the community as a religious body Mr. Dutt wants to convert it into a solid political organisation commanding on particular issues the votes of its members. He proposes therefore that an All India organisation be set up which will "carry on all the business of a thorough-going political body." Mr. Dutt remarks that this should not frighten anybody. He apparently does not realise that the suggestion that Christians should organise themselves as a political party is itself born of fear. He will, if he persists in his efforts at securing this end, meet with the opposition of the missionary who is mainly concerned with winning new adherents to his fold. Any effort at forming a political group needs for its success a homogeneous unit. The continued admission of new members on a non-political principle into such a group will work against solidarity. Mr. Dutt realises this when he insists that the one Board of Control for the community should be in Indian hands. Whether the several foreign mission boards are ready to surrender their powers and unite under one Board of Control on which their missionary members will have no seat, is extremely doubtful but it is highly probable that they will consider such unity as purchased at too high a price. Mr. Dutt's article reveals the growing communal consciousness of the Indian Christians and a tendency to regard missionary control as irksome. Those missionaries who have always felt the want of self-reliance and independence on the part of Christians as a serious obstacle to the inevitable transfer of control from alien to Indian hands, will welcome the new spirit.

ANANDRAO L. NAIR.

My acquaintance with the late Dr. A. L. Nair began in a curious way. I had received a small book of Sanskrit verse written by a Brahmin lady of Mysore. It was written in the metre known as Sardulavikridita in Sanskrit rhetoric, meaning "gambolling of the tiger", and the theme was the life of Bhagvan Buddha. It was skilfully done but there was nothing new in the material. I put it aside after the first perusal. I had forgotten all about it until several days afterwards, going to my desk one morning, I found this book prominently on it. I was in a reflective mood. The question silently formed itself in my mind, why has this Brahmin lady selected Buddha as her theme for her Sanskrit composition? Every Brahmin man, woman and child, in the South is a follower either of Sankara Ramanuja or Madhva—the three great philosopher saints of post-Buddhist Hinduism. Sankara overthrew Buddhism borrowing largely from its own armoury. Ramanuja denounced Sankara as "the veiled Buddhist" and formulated his doctrine of qualified monism. Madhva, differing from both, unfurled the standard of uncompromising dualism. All three were southerners and their followers are found in greatest strength in the South. All of them were opposed to Buddhism and, though they conceded to Buddha the status of an avatar or incarnation, they regarded him as an avatar sent down to mislead Hindus from the path of true religion, as a sort of divine agent provocateur in fact, to test the faith of the Hindu race. That a lady belonging to one of these sects, and a scholarly one, too, should have dedicated her talents to an eulogy of the Buddha, seemed to me to be a sign that the heart of Hinduism was harking back to its most illustrious son for light and solace in its modern perplexities. I met a friend, the Labour leader, Mr. Jhabvala in the train and mentioned this incident casually to him and wished that something could be done to promote the study of the teachings of the Buddha. Jhabvala at once told me that there was Dr. Nair who for years past was a devoted adherent of Buddha and that I should get in touch with him. It was thus that I met Dr. Nair. He was delighted at my suggestion and we decided on a public celebration of the triple anniversary of the birth, enlightenment and death of Lord Buddha, which according to tradition, falls on the same day, the Vaisakh purnama, the full moon in April-May. There was not much time to make arrangements. The meeting was convened at short notice at Madhav Baug. It proved an unexpected success. Friends from far and near happened to be in Bombay on the day. And they all attended. The idea of the Buddha Society was suggested at the meeting and was warmly taken up by Dr. Nair. He was elected President and remained President till his death. A group of earnest men gathered around him and the work of the Society progressed slowly but steadily. Buddhists from all lands found a welcome in Dr. Nair's hospitable home. Some of them were not quite the genuine article. But Dr. Nair asked no questions. If a man or woman sought his assistance in the name of the Bhagvan, it was given as a matter of course. Till the opening of the Ananda Vihara three years ago the fortnightly meetings of the Society were held in Dr. Nair's drawing room. Some of the addresses delivered at these gatherings were valuable contributions to the elucidation of the relation between Buddhism and post-Buddhist Hinduism which is pervaded by it.

The period following the founding of the Buddha Society was one of incessant activity to Dr. Nair. He seemed to be overwhelmed by a desire to give concrete expression to his devotion to the Bhagvan who was the incarnation of compassion for suffering humanity. The suffering which, as a medical man whose practice in his early struggling days was chiefly amongst the poorest of the poor, came most home to him, was the suffering of the sick and the maimed so many of whom go without any relief in this great city. Powell and Company had prospered and provided Dr. Nair with the wherewithal to fulfil his ambition. He built the Hospital which bears his mother's name and personally saw to it that every poor patient who sought relief got it there. He next took over the National Medical College which was on its last legs. The grand building where it is housed was built by him. His crowning act, was the building of the Vihara in the vicinity of the Hospital and the College. No one can step into it without feeling profoundly grateful to the genius of the man who, amidst the stress and noise of Bombay, raised the sanctuary which breathes the Spirit of Peace at every step. These were what Dr. Nair did. What he was, I can best illustrate by a scene which has deeply carved itself in my memory. It occurred within less than a month of his death. I with my daughter had gone to the new Chowpathi at Worli for our daily walk. We had started as usual from the south end of the walk and were nearing the north end, when I found the tall figure of Dr. Nair standing with a small crowd gathered round him. We went up to him and before I could say anything he pointed to the prostrate figure of a man who was breathing hard and unconscious. Dr. Nair's face was filled with sorrow as he told me that he found that man lying there some fifteen minutes previously without any one of the scores of people sitting on the parapet wall opposite or walking past taking the slightest notice of him. When Dr. Nair came he felt the man's pulse and found it very bad. He sent for a policeman, had a cab fetched, saw the patient comfortably placed in it to be taken to the hospital. As we were walking back he again and again recurred to the utter callousness of our people to the claims of humanity. It was a European lady, he said who had fetched the policeman at his request. The figure of Anandadas Nair, standing by the side of the prostrate figure under the dome of that evening sky and the sea softly murmuring hard by, symbols of eternity, forms a picture of which, his Master, Buddha, might Himself have been the central figure.

THOUGHTS ON THE PARSİ INTER-MARRIAGE PROBLEM.

(BY F. A. M.)

The very first thought that strikes me on this problem is that I should not be writing this article for the Reformer. It is very undesirable to discuss a purely local and very delicate question like this in any paper that is not exclusively read by the Parsis and it is very unfortunate that a number of non-Parsis should have rushed into the press on a matter that affected the feelings of the Parsis alone and of which they had no personal knowledge. It may be said that there is a right of free speech but then there is also a corresponding duty not to exercise the right under certain circumstances and it seems that if the bigger communities in India talked less of rights and thought more of duties, without which rights are meaningless, the communal problem would cease to be a problem. Such hostile criticism is bound to be unsympathetic and to seem irresponsible partly because the problem is not felt by such critics as it is by a Parsi whom it affects vitally and partly because his knowledge concerning such a small community is meagre and second hand. Hence the uncalled for disagreement becomes highly disagreeable and hurts the community because it superficially prescribes what the soul of the community strongly proscribes. And it hurts the more when it comes from a thoughtful and highly esteemed source. Thus when it was suggested presumably by the editor in an earlier issue of this journal that the Parsi girls were more cultured because they married outside their community one thought that even Homer sometimes nods. There are few occasions when one can differ from Mr. K. Natarajan and be right; and this is one of them. That is why on second thoughts I feel it incumbent on me to put the Parsi point of view before the readers of this journal.

The Parsis had to leave Persia because their religion happened to be in danger. And that is why though they have adopted many important ways of life from the other communities of India they have stuck to the faith of their forefathers. But not only have they kept aloof from other religions, they have also kept their religion aloof from other communities. It is the very essence of every important Zoroastrian ceremony that it should not be performed in the presence of those professing other religions. The dead body of a Parsi is considered impure if the gaze of any non-Parsi falls on it after the preliminary funeral ceremony. Hence their religious sentiments will not let Parsis to proselytize or even allow a willing convert to enter their fold. Therefore if a large number of Parsis were constantly converted by force or otherwise the community would gradually become practically extinct. So long as Parsis do not proselytize they must, if they must exist at all as a community, resist all proselytizing attempts directed against them. Now the marriage of Parsis outside their community has the same effect as conversion. An increase of such marriages means a decrease of the Parsi population and the danger of extinction is greater than in direct conversion by force or otherwise because it is less perceptible. Forcible or fraudulent conversion is immediately resisted perhaps with the moral support of other communities. But in the case of inter-marriages the community, when not blind, has to watch helplessly its slow but certain death. And it would rather die, so strong are its religious susceptibilities, than take converts into its fold. The only other sane alternative therefore is to create a strong prejudice against inter-marriages by keeping alive among its members the love for Parsi traditions and culture.

It may be argued by some persons who like to indulge in abstract humanitarianism that a communal spirit is the antiquated jargon of a day that is dead. Such persons would not only welcome such subtle ways of removing without violence the barriers that divide men from men but would also suggest other communities to adopt such a non-violent method. One does not wish to give more attention than they deserve to the patriots who love every country except their own or the nationalists who glory in disparaging their own community. This fashionable sentiment is an unhappy reaction to the bitterness and hatred that were let loose during the last Great War. But a diseased reaction to a diseased idea is no cure, and itself deserves to be properly diagnosed and treated. It is not the love of one's community or country, but the hatred of other communities and countries that is objectionable and it is not necessary to hate other communities in order to love your own, just as it is not necessary to hate all mothers in order to be a loving son. A healthy rivalry between factions, communities or nations has kept bright the undying fire of progress. Every great nation and community aspires to enrich its individuality by constant expression of its love for its peculiar art, religion and traditions. Smaller communities like Parsis or Jews who have no separate states for themselves and who are at the mercy of the State to which they belong needs must think of cherishing the ideals of their group. The survival value of this communal patriotism is immense. The tenacity with which the Jews, scattered throughout the world, every man's hand against them, have stuck to their race and religion, is the chief cause of their existence today. One sees their sincerity and fervour in psalms like this: "By the rivers of Babylon, there we sat down, yea wept when we remembered Zion... For there they that carried us away captive, required of us song, they that wasted us, required of us mirth. If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning. If I do not remember thee let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth; if I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy." Such words, frankly communal, the humanitarian of today may read with contempt but they have played their part in making a nation of a people without a dominion. Such a ruthless persecution as we saw recently in Germany against the Jews is not the first nor perhaps the last attack against the race, but a people that can utter such sentiments may suffer, but cannot die: Parsis too have their own sentiments that have made them feel akin and protected them against the subtle forces of extinction that hover over them like vultures. The recent increase in inter-marriages in the community is a symptom of the weakening of their hold on their peculiar culture and tradition that produced men like Dadabhai Naoroji, Sir Piroshaw Mehta and J. N. Tata. It is therefore very desirable to arouse in the Parsis an enthusiasm for their communal history and traditions that influenced them in the past. Such a communal awakening becomes dangerous only when it is nourished by distrust of and antagonism to other communities. But the Parsis have given ample proofs of their love for their adopted country and it would be a sad day for the community when Parsis forget the land that gave them a home at the time they left their native land, feeling "Here is no home, here is but a wilderness." Our love for community however does not weaken our love for our country as the growing individuality of the child does not weaken its affection for its parent. Those Don Quixotes of our days who dream of a world without nations and communities are not merely impractical but short-sighted idealists. Communities and nations make for evolution, and a world of nations need not be a warring world. A peace without anybody to struggle with is the peace of the desert. The unity that is desirable is not a barren unity without differences as in monotonous sounds but a rich union of differences that is found in great music. The main contention of this article is based on the assumption that the Parsi community is worth the trouble of preservation. A major community may say in its cynical moments, "Why should such a small community make desperate efforts to survive? The world would not be much the worse without the Parsis, if it has been able to carry on without the Greeks of yore." The unbroken record of their splendid services to India may be an effective answer to a more worthy sceptic. But such a cynical query stultifies itself, for we may well ask why any community in the world should survive at all. If it is answered that the onus of justifying its existence lies only on small communities such as an answer is not prompted by cynicism, but sheer arrogance and 'majority complex.' It is almost a postulate therefore that Parsis like every other race should survive, and, because of the circumstances discussed above, the increase of intermarriages subtly spells their extinction.

It is not because intermarriages are said to lead invariably to domestic unhappiness (such a proposition is difficult to maintain), not because Parsis are higher or better as such than others which is absurd, but because intermarriages are bound to dissolve the community in the long run that the Parsis are endeavouring to mobilise all the forces to combat the evil. And the present agitation is not new nor directed only against Parsi girls.

The Jam-E-Jamshed, a very old Parsi newspaper has endeavoured for years together to organise public opinion against this threatened danger and its splendid services to the community in this field are amply recognised by its finding a home in almost every Parsi family—rich or poor. In or about 1919 a fashion among the young men of the community to marry European girls found its way and there was naturally great excitement and the whole community voiced its disapproval to prevent the 'epidemic' from spreading further. A monster meeting was held, where among the many resolutions condemning these marriages, was one threatening to boycott the 'culprits.' But the number of Parsi girls going out of the community since 1931 is alarmingly greater than of the boys in 1919 and every day we hear of more such cases. This has created a sort of religious panic in the community. A requisition was made by a large number of Parsis to the Trustees of the Parsi Panchayet to call a meeting of the community to express its sense of the grave danger. A meeting was accordingly summoned by the Trustees, and such a meeting is found to be summoned only when there is practically unanimous opinion in its favour, where Parsi leaders holding violently hostile views on other questions met on the same platform to devise ways of meeting this insidious evil. But it is very doubtful if violent resolutions passed in meetings, attended largely by married Parsis who are themselves incapable of violating them, produce much effect on the young men and women concerned. One is reminded of resolutions by a flock of sheep condemning the carnivorous instincts of the wolf. Nor is the tendency to treat these erring young men as sinners and moral lepers desirable. The strong stand against such an attitude taken up by a section of the community, is highly commendable. Young men and women do not go in for intermarriages because of "superior culture" or out of sheer fun, but because they are subtly driven by cruel economic and other necessities. So the present tumult and the shouting should give way to a patient study of social forces that cause this havoc in the community. "It is the part of a wise man," said Spinoza, "not to bewail nor to deride but to understand." Parsis will do well to solve this problem, which they must solve or perish, in the spirit of this beautiful minded philosopher, "as though concerned with lines and planes and solids."

ABRAHAM LINCOLN AND SLAVERY. *

(By E. O. Sisson.)

Lincoln's attitude concerning slavery was quite clear and definite, but was complex, with the result that it was often misunderstood by both friends and opponents in his own day and is still seldom clearly understood. Yet it was really the attitude of the great mass of people in the North, and, strange as it may sound, of many if not most in the South. It was this attitude, shared by the mass of the North, which made it possible for him to be elected to the Presidency in 1860.

First, he "hated slavery;" it was utterly obnoxious to him and clashed with his dearest principles, both moral and political. He "thought it wrong;" and this when Christian churches, north as well as south, were busy proving that it was divinely ordained and plainly supported by the Bible. In his first office of any consequence, as member of the Illinois legislature at the age of 30, he recorded this view: when the legislature passed resolutions denouncing abolitionists and condoning slavery, Lincoln with one lone supporter read into the minutes a protest, joining in the condemnation of abolitionists, but declaring that "slavery is founded on both injustice and bad policy." In 1854, in one of his earliest speeches of significance, he speaks of the "monstrous injustice of slavery." But in all this he might almost have been quoting Jefferson or even Washington speaking a generation earlier. The land was full, north and south, of people who disliked and disapproved slavery, with a smaller number who hated it intensely.

In the second place, Lincoln's political view concerning slavery and political programme for dealing with it were clear cut and changed little, until the War changed everything. First, he was inexorably opposed to the extension of slavery; this view governed his political affiliations on all vital occasions. But he was also opposed to any aggressive interference with slavery in the states which legalized it; the constitutional provision concerning fugitive slaves which Phillips denounced as "a covenant with death and an agreement with hell," Lincoln regarded as a covenant with the slave-holding states which he was bound to respect. So he wrote to his friend Speed, a slaveholder, "I acknowledge your rights and my obligations under the constitution in regard to your slaves." This compelled him to oppose the Abolitionists and condemn their programme; and the Abolitionists in turn hated and denounced him.

* From an article on Lincoln in Open Court.

The third point is of great importance, and not quite easy to describe; it was his utter incapacity to extend his hatred of slavery to a hating of the slave-holder, or even to denouncing him morally. It was his realistic sense of the actual institution of slavery as something historical, with a long background in the old world, and with deep economic and social roots in its strange last stand in the great American Republic. It was his persistent view that slave-holders, slaves, and opponents of slavery, were all human and all caught in the mesh of events, all striving to live their lives in the midst of difficulties and perplexities and all entitled to humane and kindly consideration from their fellows in spite of differing opinions and conflicting programmes and policies.

Lincoln never fell into the prevailing Northern fallacy of throwing the whole responsibility for the institution of slavery upon the South; he saw that the guilt, if guilt there were, rested upon the Nation as a whole, North as well as South. "It is no less true for having been often said," he writes in the Second Annual Message, "that the people of the South are not more responsible for the original introduction of this property than are the people of the North; and when it is remembered how unhesitatingly we all use cotton and sugar and share in the profits of dealing in them, it may not be quite safe to say that the South has been more responsible than the North for its continuance."

These elements in Lincoln's attitude toward slavery were definitely fixed at the time of his first important public utterance on the subject, in his speech in answer to Douglas at Peoria in 1854. After denouncing slavery as wrong, and the Missouri Compromise as therefore also wrong, he goes on:

"Before proceeding, let me say that I think I have no prejudice against the Southern people. They are just what we would be in their situation. If slavery did not now exist among them, they would not introduce it. If it did now exist among us, we should not instantly give it up.....When Southern people tell us they are no more responsible for the origin of slavery than we are, I acknowledge the fact.....If all earthly power were given me, I should not know what to do, as to the existing institution. My first impulse would be to free all the slaves, and send them to Liberia.....But a moment's reflection would convince me, that whatever of high hope (as I think there is) there may be in this in the long run, its sudden execution is impossible.....I think I would not hold one in slavery, at any rate; yet the point is not clear enough for me to denounce people upon." These are striking words, not by their violence but by their moderation. It is true they were uttered before the heat of the conflict, nearly seven years before the actual outbreak of the war; but the fact is that the fury and madness of the later period, before and during the armed conflict, never changed Lincoln's attitude. In 1858, debating with Douglas, in 1860, as candidate for the presidency, and through all his career as war ruler, he never shifted from this position: he was against slavery, would not compromise with its extension, yet insisted that the slave states should solve their own domestic problem; and he demurred to all self-righteous condemnation and all spirit of revenge.

Thus on the issue of slavery and emancipation Lincoln was emphatically a moderate, and so was unsatisfactory to both extremes. The abolitionists abhorred his patience with slavery and his support of the constitutional provision for fugitive slave laws; the slave party feared and hated him for his outspoken condemnation of slavery and his unyielding stand against its extension. As a moderate, on the other hand, he was elected to the presidency and led the nation to emancipation.

To most people, north and south, emancipation was a word, and a word over which to fight. But few seem to have given attention to the question of how emancipation was to be accomplished, or what was to be done with the tremendous problems which must follow upon its heels, if accomplished. In truth nobody north or south did know what to do with slavery; it would almost seem that the more extreme abolitionists, otherwise intelligent, really supposed that abolishing slavery would somehow abolish the millions of black men, women and children who were the slaves. Lincoln, on the contrary, was deeply concerned as to the manner and method of emancipation; the problem occupied his mind greatly and appears over and over again in his public utterances. It appears in many of his state papers, letters and addresses; it is set forth in full in his second Annual Message to Congress of December 1, 1862—to my mind the greatest of all his state papers. Whoever would grasp Lincoln's mind on this great problem must read and re-read this message.

Lincoln's plan is commonly known as "compensated emancipation," but compensation is only one of the essential features of the proposal, and perhaps not the most important. Not less vital certainly is the provision for both initiative and control by the states holding the slaves, and the limitation of federal action to giving the invitation and contributing financial aid; considering the issue on which secession was most commonly justified, this was politically most intelligent. Further, the actual freeing of the slaves was to be gradual, taking, if necessary, thirty-seven years, from 1863 to 1900. Nor does Lincoln forget the vast problem of the Negroes once freed; indeed it is pretty clear that it was this aspect of the situation which had for years perplexed him; he does advert to various possibilities—segregation in territory assigned for the purpose and transportation back to Africa, in particular. The main point is that his mind is grappling resolutely with the whole picture of the thing to be dealt with; this is the essence of intelligence.

In all his many utterances not a word is said even suggesting the general enfranchisement of the freed Negroes. How conservative his view was on this phase of the problem may be inferred from a letter in 1864 to the new Union Governor of Louisiana: "I barely suggest for your private consideration, whether some of the coloured people may be let in (to the franchise) as, for instance, the very intelligent, and especially those who have fought gallantly in our ranks.....This is only a suggestion, not for the public, but to you alone." This, too, seems far more intelligent than what was actually done, with such disastrous consequences to both races in the South.

We may well revert now to Lincoln's own words, particularly the great Second Annual Message. He introduces the subject thus:

"Among the friends of the Union there is great diversity of sentiment and of policy in regard to slavery and the African race amongst us. Some would perpetuate slavery; some would abolish it suddenly, and without compensation; some would abolish it gradually, and with compensation; some would remove the freed people from us, and some would retain them with us; and there are yet other minor diversities. Because of these diversities we waste much strength in struggles among ourselves.These articles are intended to embody a plan of such mutual concessions. If the plan shall be adopted, it is assumed that emancipation will follow at least in several of the states.

"As to the first article, the main points are: first; the emancipation; secondly, the length of time for consummating it—thirty-seven years; and thirdly, the compensation.

"The emancipation will be unsatisfactory to the advocates of perpetual slavery; but the length of time should greatly mitigate their dissatisfaction. The time spares both races from the evils of sudden derangement—in fact, from the necessity of any derangement.....Another class will hail the prospect of emancipation, but will deprecate the length of time. They will feel that it gives too little to the now living slaves. But it really gives them much. It saves them from the vagrant destitution which must largely attend immediate emancipation in localities where their numbers are very great; and it gives the inspiring assurance that their posterity shall be free forever.

Next Lincoln points out the striking fact that such a plan would tend to shorten the duration of the war, perhaps even availing to lead the revolted states to make peace in order to seize the chance of compounding the loss which the ultimate freeing of the slaves would entail. He then discusses various aspects of the proposal, with relevant statistical data, and with consideration of many possible objections. He concludes with an appeal to the hearts of his audience, so unusual in a document of this nature that he apologizes for its tone:

"Is it doubted, then, that the plan I propose, if adopted, would shorten the war, and thus lessen its expenditure of money and blood? Is it doubted that it would restore the national authority and national prosperity, and perpetuate both indefinitely? Is it doubted that we here—Congress and executive—can secure its adoption? Will not the good people respond to a united and earnest appeal from us? Can we, can they, by any other means so certainly or so speedily assure these vital objects? We can succeed only by concert. It is not 'Can any of us imagine better?' but 'Can we all do better?' Object whatsoever is possible, still the question occurs, 'Can we do better?'

Lincoln was thus facing the facts with regard to the freeing of the slaves and the abolition of the institution of slavery: although desiring that all men should be free, he saw intensely the huge problem of the millions of freed slaves; although the leader of the North, he could not forget the just claims of the South. So he labours in this great message to get his Northern audience, Congress, and the people, to see the facts as he does, and he beseeches them to lay aside hatred and prejudice and act before it is too late. He rises in his peroration to what may well be considered the highest pitch of his eloquence:

"The dogmas of the quiet past are inadequate to the stormy present. The occasion is piled high with difficulty, and we must rise with the occasion. As our case is now, so we must think anew and act anew. We must disenthrall ourselves, and then we shall save our country.....We shall nobly save or meanly lose the last, best hope of earth. Other means may succeed; this could not fail. The way is plain, peaceful, generous, just—a way which, if followed, the world will forever applaud, and God must forever bless.”

These wise and just proposals of Lincoln met at first with no little approval, and the prospect of their realization seemed bright. Lincoln's special message in March of 1862 proposing a resolution on the subject was received favourably by Congress, and the resolution passed by large majorities in both houses. Better yet, Congress in April of the same year passed an act to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, and this act included at least two of Lincoln's favourite principles—compensation and colonization. Yet in the final event all came to naught: emancipation, when it came, was necessarily a mere blanket decree, without any effective recognition of the practical and concrete aspects of the situation. Hate, fear, mutual animosity, and suspicion, not only between the two combatant peoples, but in the midst of both, brought to naught the carefully nurtured plan and exposed the outcome to passion and chance.

It is true that Lincoln never completely gave up his hopes; even as late as February of 1865, he laid before his Cabinet a plan to offer the Confederate Government four hundred million dollars as purchase price for the slaves; but all except Seward were against it, and Lincoln sadly folded and laid away the draft of the proposal. Thus ended the first of Lincoln's “Lost Causes”; the black men were to be freed, but not in his “plain, peaceful, generous, just” way.

PROSTITUTION IN RUSSIA.

The social revolution has caused great changes in the relations between men and women. Prostitution has greatly decreased, says the scientific correspondent of “The Manchester Guardian,” owing to the flexibility of the marriage laws, the increased economic independence of women, and because not enough private wealth is available to make the profession profitable. There are special institutes for reclaiming such prostitutes as exist, to a normal life. The institute for the training of ex-prostitutes in Moscow bases its work on the teaching of a trade to the patient. The majority of Moscow prostitutes are young peasant girls just arrived from the country. They have no trade and are not immediately able to get work. As soon as they have learnt a trade and know how to earn their living they leave prostitution almost without exception. Educated prostitutes are much more difficult to deal with.

It is stated that before the Revolution Moscow had a population of 1,800,000 and 20,000 registered prostitutes. In 1928 the population was 2,500,000 and there were 8,000 known prostitutes. The number now is 500. The decrease since 1928 is attributed to the absence of unemployment and the increase of cultural opportunities. Besides the reasons already mentioned, the existence of legal abortion, and the concentration of the people's attention on social reconstructions such as the Five-year Plan, have helped to make the Russians less sexually conscious than Western peoples. Literature and the cinema are free from the domination of sex interest.

Many of the patients come to the institute voluntarily. Others are persuaded to come by special brigades of agitators who go looking for them in the streets. A man convicted of soliciting has the fact registered on his trade union card. If convicted a second time the fact is published on the wall-newspaper of the factory in which he works. Many men prefer to go to Siberia rather than have this happen, and it is clear that the method of public exposure is a tremendous weapon against prostitution.

The systematic practice of abortion is another remarkable feature of Soviet life. In Moscow there are 60,000 births a year, and 70,000 abortions are performed in the Moscow clinics. The patient is in the institute for three or four days, and comes one day before the operation. The operation is simple and is performed in about three minutes. No anæsthetic is used. Adequate reasons for having an abortion are existing children, poor living conditions, interference with important work, the absence of the husband in the Red Army, etc. In every case the law places the interest of the child first. If it will not have a fair chance it should not be born. All children born in U. S. S. R. have a legally defined father. If a woman is uncertain who is the father of her child the Court makes up her mind for her. The defined father has then to pay an allowance for the child. Thus all children legally are allowed for, but, undoubtedly, a considerable number of men must be paying for other men's children.

The Nansen Institute for the Protection of Mother and Child, and the Factory Dispensary are examples of the best side of Soviet medical practice and the one from which the rest of Europe has something to learn. There is systematic recording of the health of the population of the district—i.e., of 35,000 persons. The medical history of a man and his relatives can be found by the doctor in a few seconds, and the patient stays under the charge of the same doctor. All families are visited in their homes and all workers in their factories. The institute had some good minor innovations, such as resting-places for mothers to place their babies while in the waiting-room, and thus not have the fatigue of nursing them. They have twelve institutes of this kind in U. S. S. R. and hope to have fifty by 1935.

PROSTITUTION IN THE UNITED STATES.

The “business of prostitution” has increased in many cities during the last five years, according to a study made by Bascom Johnson and Paul M. Kinsie for the American Social Hygiene Association reported in Journal of Social Hygiene for December, 1933. Conditions in 58 cities in 48 states were studied by expert investigators. The main reasons for this increase “in volume and flagrancy” are considered to be: “The indifference of public opinion occupied with other questions of common interest; a letdown by officials in law enforcement because of lessened personnel and budgetary resources, inefficiency and indifference, and in some places political tie-ups with the underworld; and an increase in the activities of third party exploiters and of the prostitutes themselves.....”

Public sentiment in the United States was not aroused in regard to prostitution until a few years before the World War. In the years immediately following the war “the trend of public opinion was generally towards a continuous programme of repression to reduce commercialized prostitution to a minimum, as the only practical method of control of such vice.” In 1927-28 and in 1932-33 surveys were made by American Social Hygiene Association to discover “the volume of prostitution business,” “flagrancy of operation,” “activities of third party exploiters,” “methods of operation,” “attitude of the officials and the public towards law and law enforcement,” and “special environmental factors encouraging or discouraging the operation of prostitution.” In 1932-33 it was found that prostitution had decreased in 17 of the 58 cities studied and increased in 41. The greatest increase was found in the cities of 250,000 to 500,000 population.

Soon after the financial depression began it became evident that the situation was changing for the worse.

The business of prostitution has been greatly aided by "the diversion of public interest from law enforcement to problems of relief." Normally, prostitution is carried on in the slums and "run-down sections" of a city. But the great need of property owners for tenants in better neighbourhoods has resulted in the entrance of prostitution into "business and residential neighbourhoods which formerly were immune."

The types of resorts found in different parts of the country reflect the attitude of the public. Where soliciting from doorways and windows is forbidden by the authorities, resorts are conducted as small hotels or rooming houses. In some Southwestern cities "undisguised brothels and cribs appear," and in some southern cities "various classes of hotels both large and small harbour occasional prostitutes." In many of the eastern cities prostitution resorts are somewhat scattered and "less flagrant in operation." Third-party exploiters are again engaged in business, acting as distributing centers for resorts who want girls or prostitutes looking for a location.
